SCENE: A Sunday-school. Young lady catechising the children on the plagues of Egypt. Y. L.: "And what became of the plagues of locusts?" A pause. Then a small boy at bottom, suddenly: "Please, Miss, I know! John the Baptist ate them."

THE dude is not the only worthless fellow in the world. There are 4,000 unemployed clergymen in the church of England, but they do less harm, remarks the Winsted Press, than the other thousands of clergymen who are busily engaged at their trade.

DR. LADELL has discovered that prussic acid is an antidote to poisoning with strychnine. Medical men will be cautious in using it, however, as the prussic acid, to be of any use, must be given in doses which would be fatal under any other circumstances.

THE Jackson, Mich., Evening Star administers a kick to a Methodist revivalist like this: "The 'Evangelist' Weber requests the Star to print his sermon on prayer. We are disposed to giv the actor and his play a liberal amount of advertising, and hav done so; but to devote so much of our space to his theater as this would require is asking too much. We shall be obliged to charge him ten cents per line for that; and even at that price we prefer to decline to print the impious harang." The Star claims to be a moral paper.

AT a low place of entertainment in this city, just before a pugilistic encounter, the proprietor of the hall announced that a woman with two small children was on the premises; that they were friendless and penniless, and had just been served with a dispossess warrant. He passed a hat with a $10 note in it, and collected $40 more. Yet the Christians contend that mankind is totally depraved.

GEORGE BANCROFT, the historian, is now eighty-three years old, and would not be surprised to see at least a score more. He has not so much flesh on his bones as he had ten years ago, but what he has is all good, solid muscle, of the same material as the famed "shay" of the good old deacon, which dropped to pieces all at once. His wife, perhaps the most cultured woman in Washington, was eighty years old the latter part of last month, and she looks much the healthier of the two. Her eyes are bright, and her cheeks full and rosy. She is a very pretty lady, and one would not think of taking her for more than sixty at the most. She has a wonderful eyesight, and can see at long distances without glasses, though she uses them to read by.

PRESIDENT PATTON, of Howard University, writes that the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States adverse to the constitutionality of the Civil Rights bill has produced excitement among the colored people, who seem to feel that all their defenses hav been suddenly removed, and that hereafter they may be insulted and outraged with impunity. He sets forth, however, that the decision was by no means unexpected; that it has not established any political doctrin contrary to the rights of the negroes, and that it leaves them as to legal protection just where it leaves white people. He advises them to refrain from an unwise railing at the supreme court, acquaint themselvs with the facts and principles of the case, and stand up hopefully and courageously for their legal rights.

LANDING in Honolulu on Sunday, a writer for the San Francisco Chronicle set forth to see the people of the capital of the Hawaiian kingdom; but all the houses were closed, and, after a depressing walk in the deserted streets, he turned his steps toward his ship. He found one door open—a chemist's shop with a soda water fountain. The thermometer marked above 100°; yet the keeper of the place had to say, "We do not sell soda to-day; we can't buy ice on Sunday." The writer continues: "A photographer who had traveled with us had proposed to show a few of his new acquaintances some pictures of the island in his studio, but now he expressed his regret that it could not be done. "But why not?" "Oh, you could not see them without light." "But there is plenty of light." "Ah, you do not know Honolulu," said the photographer; "if a window of my place were to be seen open on Sunday we should all get into trouble, and mine wouldn't end soon."

THE heretic Luther, whose birthday anniversary was celebrated last week, givs the Christian ministry and the priests a fine opportunity to display their spite. While the Protestants were lauding the German Infidel to the skies, and as much further up as imagination could reach, and kicking the pope, the Catholics were pointing out his inconsistencies and wiping their theological shoes upon him and his followers. The truth probably is that Luther was an intolerant bigot like all other true Christians. He wanted the right of private judgment for himself alone, just as the miserable old puritans wanted religious freedom for themselvs alone, just as all true Christians want liberty for themselvs alone. That his teaching finally split the church into sects, and the sects into fragments, and so liberated the world from complete slavery to superstition, must be granted, to his everlasting credit, but that he intended to do this is not at all probable. As M. Capel (depreciatingly) says, his teaching "tends to Rationalism and Agnosticism," which is undoubtedly true—he builded better than he knew. He could not hav been a consistent Christian and yet a rebel to the only true Christian church and the head of it at Rome, but he was a man of power, and the man for his time, and the world is very much better for his having lived in it.—Winsted Press.

THE Boston Post thus apostrophizes the Nutmeg state: "O Connecticut, of ancient fame as the land of steady habits, how are your pious pretenses pricked when we read your history by the light of contemporaneous criticism! A friend sends us the following extracts from the will of Lewis Morris, father of the celebrated Gouverneur Morris, recorded in the surrogate's office, New York, liber 23, page 426, Nov. 19, 1760: "It is my wish that my son, Gouverneur, shall hav the best education that can be furnished him in England or America, but my express will and direction are that under no circumstances shall he be sent to the colony of Connecticut for that purpose, lest in his youth he should imbibe that low craft and cunning so incident to the people of that country, and which are so interwoven in their constitution that they can not conceal it from the world, though many of them, under the sanctified garb of religion, hav attempted to impose themselvs upon the world as honest men."

FORTY years ago there was not a millionaire in the United States. Twenty years ago there were three or four only. Now there are at least a thousand, and a fortune of a million is not considered anything remarkable. The hundred-millionaire takes the place of the millionaire of twenty years ago. There are already two individuals and twenty corporations that can count their wealth up to a hundred millions. The next step will be the billionaire. The statistics of property, on the other hand, cannot be reached accurately. But observation would teach us that there is now a larger proportion of industrious people wholly dependent upon daily labor for daily bread than ever before. The problem of living bears harder and heavier upon the working people. A feeling of dependence has dispirited them, and they liv almost constantly in the shadow of anxiety. A bright countenance is the exception among them. The face of the typical workingman is anxious, careworn, toilworn, and troubled. A comparison of these extremes of affluence and poverty, of splendor and misery, must lead the earnest thinker to see that there is something fatally wrong in a system which makes them possible.

JAMES FRAZIER, an Elder in the Second Reformed church of Newburgh, N. Y., has been indicted for libeling a well-known young lady who attends that church. He is forty years old. The indictment is for criminal libel and malicious annoyance. The person alleged to hav been libeled is a respected young lady of good family, to whom Frazier, who is a widower, has long paid much attention. It was supposed that they were engaged to marry, but it appears, on the contrary, that Frazier received the mitten, and a gentleman of New York won the affections of the young lady and will soon wed her. Frazier was very much incensed at the failure of his lovemaking, and he wrote to the young lady to return some rings he had given her, and threatened, if they were not returned or he was not reimbursed for them, he would make disagreeable disclosures. The rings, however, had been stolen by burglars, who entered the house of the young lady's father some time ago, and so Frazier's request could not be complied with. Frazier then demanded $21 for the rings, and declared if he did not receive the money his disclosures would be made at a certain time. No money was paid to him, and when the time arrived an anonymous letter was received by the young lady's mother. The letter is long, and contains the vilest accusations. They shocked the family of the young lady, and, believing Frazier to be the writer, they decided to seek redress in the courts. The letter was received at the time that Frazier threatened in his previous letters to make his disclosures. He denies, however, that he wrote the letter.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.

Gospel of Matthew.—"The titles which in both the English and Greek testaments are found at the head of the respectiv gospels, as, 'The Gospel according to Matthew,' 'The Gospel according to Mark,' etc., do not authoritativly indicate these men as their authors; were doubtless placed in their present position at some time subsequent to the date of composition" (E. Cone Bissell's Hist. Origin of the Bible).

"We are told on the authority of Papias, Irenæus, Pantænus, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, and many other fathers, that the gospel was written in Hebrew. But this is open to grave doubt. It is conceded, the original Hebrew of which they speak, no one of them ever saw; and so little store has the church set upon it that it has utterly perished."

"It is certain that a gospel, not the same as our canonical Matthew, sometimes usurped the apostle's name, and some of the witnesses we hav quoted appear to hav referred to this in one or other of its various forms or names."

"The Nazarenes and Ebionites possessed each a modification of the same gospel, which no doubt each altered more and more as other tenets diverged."

"Nothing can be said with any certainty as to when this gospel was written. The most probable supposition is that it was written between 50 and 60. The exact year cannot even be guessed at" (Smith's Bib. Dict., Art. Matthew).

Gospel of Mark.—"As in the case of the preceding evangelist, we are obliged to depend for the name of the author of the second gospel upon tradition" (E. Cone Bissell's Hist. Origin of the Bible).

"The results of criticism as to the relation of the three gospels are somewhat humiliating. Up to this day three views are maintained with equal ardor:

"(a) That Mark's gospel is the original gospel out of which the other two hav been developed.

"(b) That it was a compilation from the other two, and therefore was written last.

"(c) That it was copied from that of Matthew, and forms a link of transition between the other two.

"It is obvious that they refute one another; the same internal evidence suffices to prove that Mark is the first, and the last, and the intermediate.

"Probably it was written between A.D. 63 and 70. The place where the gospel was written is as uncertain as the time" (Smith's Bib. Dict., p. 519).

Gospel of Luke.—The gospel of Luke is prefaced with an avowal that does away with any claims to divine inspiration or authority.

"Forasmuch as many hav taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those things which are most surely believed among us.

"Even as they delivered them unto us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word.

"It seemed good to me also, having had perfect understanding of all things from the very first, to write unto thee in order, most excellent Theophilus,

"That thou mightest know the certainty of those things wherein thou hast been instructed" (Luke i, 1–4).

Many others had set forth those things, and it simply "seemed good" to Luke, since he had perfect understanding (not divine help or inspiration), to write to his friend.

Luke shows no especial respect for Matthew's or Mark's gospel. It is evident he had no idea their so-called gospels claimed to be written under inspiration or by divine authority, or that they were anyway entitled to any credit or reverence more than any of the "many others who had written of those things."

Luke, realizing that the discrepancies and contradictions of the many writers led to doubt and confusion, wrote an account of what he believed to be the truth, for the especial benefit of his friend, Theophilus.

Had Luke known or believed that Matthew, or Mark, or anyone else, had written a gospel under divine inspiration, he would hav cited Theophilus to it, as a most sure guide and authority by which every question could be decided, and every doubt at once removed.

"The ancient opinion that Luke wrote his gospel under the influence of Paul, rests on the authority of Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius."

"But the language of the preface is against the notion of any exclusiv influence of Paul. The four verses could not hav been just at the head of a history composed under the exclusiv guidance of Paul or any one apostle, and as little could they hav introduced a gospel communicated by another" (Smith's Bib. Dict., p. 492.)

Gospel of John.—"The fact that this gospel is not quoted by Clement of Rome, that Polycarp, Hermans, and Barnabas do not refer to it, serves to confirm the statement that it is a very late production of the apostolic age."

"Cerdon, Marcion, the Mountainists, and other ancient heretics, did not deny that St. John was the author of the gospel, but they held that the apostle was mistaken, or that his gospel had been interpolated."

"In the fourth gospel the narrativ coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only."

"Some portions of the gospel hav been regarded by certain critics as interpolations. The 25th verse and the latter half of the 24th of chapter xxi are generally received as an undisguised addition, probably by the elders of the Ephesian church when the gospel was first published" (Smith's Bible Dict).

Some of the Causes of Error.—"Various readings are due to different causes; some arose from accidental, others from intentional, alterations of the original text.

"Accidental variations or errata are by far the most numerous class. Some are errors of sound. The most frequent form of this error is called itacism, a confusion of different varieties of the i sound. Very few manuscripts are wholly free from mistakes of this kind; some abound in them."

"Other variations are due to errors of sight. These arise from confusion of similar letters, or from the repetition or omission of the same letters, or from the recurrence of a similar ending in consecutiv clauses, which often causes one to be passed over when the eye mechanically returns to the copy. To these may be added the false division of words in transcribing the text from the continuousuncialwriting.

"Other variations may be described as errors of impression or memory. The copyist, after reading a sentence from the text before him, often failed to reproduce it exactly. He transposed the words, or substituted a synonym for some very common term, or gave a direct personal turn to what was objectiv before. Examples occur in every page, almost in every verse, of the New Testament" (Smith's Bible Dict).

But if there are so many errors unintentional, when the copyist really desired to make faithful copy, how would it be when, as was almost invariably the case, the copyist was interested in changing the text to suit his own views, or those of his patron or sect?

And remember there were no originals in existence by which to detect and correct the errors. These copyists were all churchmen—most of them the much revered early fathers. Their writings alone, and not God's interposition, or divine inspiration, is all the evidence we hav of any sacredness or authority of the New Testament.

Character of the Early Christian Fathers.—What was the character of the early custodians and copyists of the sacred manuscripts?

There has been no more learned or zealous defender of the New Testament and the Christian faith, none more often quoted as authority on all points of church history, than Mosheim.

"Johann Laurenz von Mosheim was a German theologian, noted as an ecclesiastical historian of great merit. His deep knowledge, patient research, his general candor and impartiality, entitle Mosheim to a place among the best church historians" (Cyc. Bib. Theo. and Eccl. History).

"They who were desirous [in the third century] of surpassing all others in piety, looked upon it as lawful, and even laudable, to advance the cause of piety by artifice and fraud. It was an act of virtue to deceive and lie, when by that means the interests of the church might be promoted" (Mosheim, Eccl. History).

Archibald Bowen, a devout Bible-worshiper, in his "History of the Popes," vol. i, p. 1, Phil. ed. 1847, says:

"False and lying traditions are of an early date, and the greatest men hav, out of pious credulity, allowed themselvs to be imposed upon by them."

Dr. Cumming, of London, in "Lectures on Romanism," p. 203, thus speaks of the authority of the fathers of the early church:

"Some of these were distinguished for their genius, some for their eloquence, a few for their piety, and too many for their fanaticism and superstition." Ephraim Pagitt in "Christianography," part 2, p. 59, London Ed., 1636, says:

"The church of Rome, to maintain their errors and articles of faith:

"1st. They hav corrupted many of the ancient fathers, and reprinting them, make them speak as they would hav them.

"2d. They hav written many books in the name of these ancient writers, and forged many decrees, canons, and councils, to bear false witness to them."

Adam Clarke "Commentary on Prov. viii," speaking of the authority and reliability of the testimony of the fathers:

"But of these we may safely assert that there is not a truth in the most orthodox creed that cannot be proved by their authority; nor a heresy that has disgraced the Romish church, that may not challenge them as its abettors."

In his autobiography page 134, he says:

"We should take heed how we quote the fathers in proof of the doctrins of the gospel, because he who knows them best, knows that on many of these subjects they blow hot and cold."

Christians claim the New Testament is infallible. Webster defines infallible, "incapable of mistake, not liable to fail or disappoint."

We hav quoted only Christian authorities of highest standing among all Protestants. And their evidence clearly proves:

1st. That there are no originals of the New Testament manuscripts in existence.

2d. That no originals hav existed since the second century—if they ever really existed at all.

3d. That the New Testament was translated, not from original manuscripts or reliable copies, but from what was claimed to be copies of the originals, which—if copies at all—abounded in errors and perversions.

4th. That the early fathers, under whose direction and supervision all copies were made, were men who regarded it as an act of virtue to deceive and lie. The very best—those who surpassed all others in piety—looked upon it as laudable to advance the cause of piety by artifice and fraud.

5th. That our present version is founded on translations by Romish priests, that by all scholars were denounced as faulty, heretical, and designedly perversions of the originals.

6th. That Luke, one of the most sacred of the four gospels, according to its own preface, was not written by divine aid or inspiration, nor by or through the influence or dictation of any of the apostles or disciples.

7th. "That the distinctiv names of the gospels imply a collection, and the titles of the epistles are notes by the possessors and not addresses by the writers" (Smith's Bib. Dict., p. 617).

No intelligent person would accept as authoritativ any book or history so utterly destitute of evidence of genuinness or reliability. The authorities we hav quoted admit there is no evidence that our New Testament is the inspired word of God, or that he by divine interposition has preserved and miraculously handed it down to us in all its original truth and beauty.

On the contrary, all the evidence we can obtain proves the very reverse.

Yet in the face of all this, we are solemnly assured the "internal evidence" is all-sufficient; that reading the New Testament will bring conviction of its genuinness, of its being the pure, holy, inspired word of God. In our next we propose to calmly, dispassionately, examin this much-lauded "internal evidence."

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

CHRISTIANITY.

Of him who is called Christ, I hav to say he taught, at best, what mighty sages spoke in times before.

What revelation did he bring to man? Upon the pyramids, which ante-date by centuries his birth, are graved the precepts that he called his own.

The gentle Buddha long before had taught not only all of worth within the Christian creed, but vastly more, omitting but the hatred and revenge that brand "the tyrant" upon the God of Christ.

Let us review in detail the Christian schemes of creation and of salvation.

An omnipotent God (having, nevertheless, no power to foresee the effects of his own creativ acts), creates (i. e., makes from nothing) one world and one man. Presently, however, noticing his oversight, he adds a woman made from a very small portion of the man.

The pair, as is well known, quickly disappointed the brilliant expectations which this astute and far-seeing deity had formed regarding them; the result was a very hasty breaking up of their model housekeeping plan, of which the most agreeable and salient features were, first, nothing to do, and plenty of it; and, second, a delightful freedom from the trammels and inconveniences naturally arising from the use of extraneous covering.

The immediate results in those days of the flagrant offense against the canons of health, of eating green pippins, was the production of a very imperious voice, issuing apparently from behind a tree (which voice really belonged, as one would readily suspect, to the irate owner of the fruit), commanding the wretched couple to throw up their lease of the grounds, and that without even twenty-four hours' notice.

The better to insure this result, the proprietor of the orchard introduced on the spot a sort of moral "Bobby," or police officer (genus now extinct), brandishing a big, two-edged sword, and called a "cherubim," whatever that may be.

It certainly should ever stand accredited to the account of this couple, that, notwithstanding the brevity of their notice to quit, they had the good sense to "move on," without attempting to wait and discuss the matter.

I should hav done precisely as they did under analogous circumstances.

Just suppose that by any tardy lounging and loitering in their garden they had aroused the ire of the officer in charge, and that he had lost his temper

(as is so frequent an occurrence with those of his "profesh" here), and slashed at them once or twice with his big two-edged sword, what might not hav been the result? What ghost of a chance could a naked man and woman hav had in contending with an infuriated guardian of the peace provided with such a weapon?

Just think of it! Suppose the "cherubim" had lunged at him, and struck with his bright saber just where that rib had been recently extracted to make a woman of, and with the gaping wound just healed by "first intention," what then? Why, where would we hav been to-day? With this man gone, how could the world hav gone on? Recollect God used up all the "nothing" he had on hand to make this first man, and was obliged to take a piece of him to make a woman out of. Reflect, then, for one moment, ere we proceed, upon what must hav been the disastrous effect upon future generations, had this "cherubim" (or "sergeant," I prefer to call him) exceeded his commission, as mundane policemen are so apt to do, often, indeed, preferring to "take in" the wrong man to none at all.

Let us drop the veil, and pursue this agonizing speculation no further.

After this summary eviction, the crest-fallen pair betook themselvs to agricultural pursuits; but after a while, things not proving entirely satisfactory to this God, he decided to drown all of the descendants of this man and woman, with the exception of one family, which was to be preserved by manning a kind of primitiv canal-boat, devoid of all steering-gear.

After a highly enjoyable and successful trip, they sighted land and disembarked with their very numerous list of brute fellow-passengers.

Well, things seemed to still "gang aglee" with the omnipotent, for, after another ominous rest, Jehovah decided upon making one masterly political stroke which should utterly discomfit and confound all his enemies, and carry confusion and dismay into the very camp and serried hosts of satan.

He therefore selected the Jews to be his chosen people, and played the part of a Castor and Pollux to them in all their many bloody wars of extermination and of conquest.

It was "Mary and the lamb" a few centuries ahead of time.

But now comes his crowning coup d'etat in this strange business, which was no less a scheme than the following:

He, true to the dictates of his cruel and revengeful nature, decided upon introducing into the world, through the mediumship of a supposedly virtuous (?) and estimable young woman, Miss Mary —— (last name now unknown), who, however, was already engaged to an industrious and well-to-do young man, Mr. Joseph —— (also last name now unknown), an individual without a father, who should at one and the same time be both God and himself.

This now deservedly famous personage (who was, as I hav explained above, at the same time both God and himself) God loved with "an exceeding great love," and, with a charming inconsistency, always insisted upon calling his "only begotten son," although said son was himself!

Certainly this was a particularly close bond of relationship, and we shall now, understanding this very peculiar system of divine "double entry," be better enabled to fully comprehend the vastness of the sacrifice about to be unfolded.

Jehovah, recollect, loved this son more than all his other children.

Revolving, in his capacious mind, how he could, with the best grace, escape the necessity of damning eternally all creation, the meteoric idea struck him of transferring all his presumably just anger against the world in general to the broad shoulders of this divinely unfortunate scapegoat, and, since he needs must appease his wrath by immolating somebody, murder him, instead of the guilty parties!

Grand conception! Exquisit sense of justice! For illustration: John Smith is committed, tried, and sentenced, for the "taking-off" of William Brown. Shall Smith hang? Not if "the powers that be" can help it! Innocent, I am apprehended and forced to assume the position and sentence of Smith! I am hung! Grand finale, tableau, and "coffins for one!"—and he the wrong man! Never mind. Blood has been spilt (no matter whose), and justice is appeased!

Such, only on a grander scale, when impartially considered, is this drama of the skies!

Fair and honest, my esteemed readers, I ask you if the inculcation of such a belittling and degrading system of "morals" as this can prove otherwise than pernicious?

Can such a system tend to develop or strengthen, in the boy or girl, correct ideas of justice and of equal rights?

Wicked or absurd in so many of its doctrins, is Christianity worthy a place in the ethics of 1883?

Priests assure us it is this particular form of religion which has made the Caucasian the foremost race in lofty and cultured thought.

The statement is as empty as the wretched creed it seeks to screen.

Not from the moldering cemetery of defunct and fossil thought draw we our store, but from the gigantic energies of the colossus, steam, applied by the skilled brain and hand to the locomotiv, the steamship, and, above all, to the printing-press. From the electric telegraph, too, uniting two mighty continents by a filament almost as slender as a spider's web, yet controling, with its imperious voice, the markets of the world; from the free schools, and the liberty of the press (venal though it be); from the ballot-box, and from the perfection of the myriad forms of mechanical art.

Like the rock, imbedded long ago within the icy bosom of the glacier, is the inert mass of Christianity borne along upon the broad tide of advancing knowledge, soon to be discharged, like the rock, from the glacier's mouth, to be of it a part no longer. The simile is fairly drawn, and time will justify its truth.

The Jewish and Christian schemes hav not even the feeble merit of novelty to recommend them.

The Jewish mythology was transferred, substantially, from the Hindoo philosophy, and that, in all probability, from systems still more ancient.

In the Hindoo fable we hav the garden of Eden (Island of Ceylon); the first man, Adam (Adami); the first woman, Heva (Eve); Cristna (Christ); Siva (Satan); and Vishnu (the Almighty).

The man and the woman are tempted by Siva (Satan), and are overcome by his wiles, as in our copy of the transaction.

In fact, our religion is, to quote from Tom Moore,

> "All borrowed thunder,
> All second-hand roar."

The famous, or, rather, the infamous, dogma of the trinity, whose absurd arithmetic titled idiots and sanguinary priests considered sufficient pretext for the butchery of multitudes of their fellow-creatures, was an ancient fable, found in numerous anterior religions.

In India the images of the Trismurti, or three-faced god, are to this day objects of Brahmanical worship.

In Egypt the triad consisted of Osiris, the creator; Typhon, the destroyer; and Horus, the preserver.

In Buddhism, the triad was formed by Buddha, the divine man; Dharmma, the word; and Sangha, the communion of saints.

In Persia, it was formed by Ormuzd, the creator; Ahriman, the destroyer; and Mithra, the restorer.

Christna, the Indian Christ, is represented being, as in Christianity, an incarnation of the great god (in this instance Vishnu).

History boasts upwards of a dozen "crucified saviors," so that even in the item of a savior, where many of us supposed ourselvs strong, we are, in reality, painfully weak.

Is not, after all, our religious establishment, which possesses but one "crucified savior," out of a baker's dozen or more possessed by our neighbors—and even this single one compelled to enact his well-worn role amid tattered scenery and properties purloined from our predecessors in the business—is not, I say America's religious establishment, like her dilapidated navy, an affair which looks best from a distance, and which will not bear too close inspection?

Decidedly I think such is the case.

And what shall we say of the intellectual breadth of a savior who, coming upon a barren fig-tree in the time when (as is expressly stated in the text, and most unequivocally,) figs were entirely out of season, thereupon fell into a fit of childish or imbecilic rage, and cursed the tree forthwith, it being, according to this incredible narrativ, by the next day withered and dead?

Who but an unreasoning and bigoted Christian would think of placing upon a plane of equality this petulant, inconsistent credist, and the gracious, noble Buddha, the spiritual Plato, the sublime Socrates, the broad-minded Epictetus, the wise Zoroaster, or the profound Confucius?

From the standpoint of political economy, what a ruinous speculation has been, and will be, this savior to us!

Think of what he cost us in the past—untold millions of innocent lives! And now that we hav for the most part outgrown him, as boys outgrow a last-year's suit of clothes, what can we do with him?

We cannot get rid of him, for all nations who care for such expensiv luxuries are already provided with far better ones than ours, out of the baker's dozen.

He must die, then, on our hands, and the sooner the better, for his worship in America alone is estimated to cost us the neat little sum of five hundred dollars per minute!

If it be true that religion is a necessary check upon the passions of the masses, which I much question, then let us use all diligence to educate them above the need of such necessity.

It is a difficult problem to solve, why a man of truly exalted intellect and imagination, like the poet Shelley, for example, required no religion to fill a supposed "aching void," while the hod-carrier and street-scavenger cannot normally exist without it.

Had the first Napoleon (great in nearly all things save blind trust in the better impulses of mankind and in religion) been content with the anti-religious order of things prevailing when he assumed the purple, we should hav had, perhaps, a fairer opportunity than has ever yet been afforded of judging how far religion is requisit to the well-being of a great people.

At this epoch in the history of France, not a church-bell tolled on a Sabbath morning, nor did a single worshiper in all the broad land wend his devout way toward the village sanctuary.

This was in truth a period of anarchy, which caused, but was not caused by, the banishment of religion.

It is frequently advanced as a proof of the intuitiv qualities of religion, that most barbarous and savage tribes profess some form of it, no matter how crude or fantastic.

By following the same line of reasoning we might fairly assume that the belief in the flatness, and lack of all motion, in our earth, which was once well nigh universal, was a divine intuition, or, indeed, the existence of any other error once prevalent among the barbarians of our race.

The universality of an opinion is, at the best, a very meager proof of its validity, and, in my opinion, the judgment of one advanced intellect, schooled by long and careful study of the "law of probabilities," is possessed of almost infinitly more weight than the blind and unreasoning superstition of a multitude of degraded savages.

The bare fact of a million ignoramuses believing in the validity of any assumed proposition does not materially strengthen the evidence in its favor, since the infinit multiplication of a zero must still giv the same barren result.

It seems to me as well-nigh certain that the prediction of England's greatest living thinker, Herbert Spencer, will be fulfiled to the letter, viz., that mankind will eventually settle down to a belief in the existence of a principle (intelligent, or non-intelligent, they perhaps may never be able to decide), and which scientists to-day term force.

Before I quit this subject, I desire to direct your attention to the almost utter lack, in the religion of Christ, of that inculcation of forbearance and kindness toward the lower (?) animals, which so beautifully distinguishes and ennobles the doctrins taught by the wise and humane Buddha, justly called "The Light of Asia."

In the Christian doctrins the brutes are represented as being but the property of man, their anointed lord and master, designed simply for his convenience, and possessing no rights nor claim to equable or kind treatment, except as it suit man's own good pleasure and profit.

Contrast this detestable selfishness with Buddha's noble doctrin that we owe to every sentient being undeniable and equal rights, and which grandly places upon the same plane of mercy all breathing things.

Which, think you, my brother, is the sublimer creed?

When I reflect upon the wickedness, pettiness, and gross absurdity of much of Christianity, I marvel not that it is swiftly hastening to its fall, but that it stood in grotesque deformity so long, a living creed!

The ax is at its root! Those leprous, crawling things, that gorged for ages on its poisonous fruit, instinctivly foreknow their coming doom!

Those sleek religious sloths, yon horde of idle priests, the vampires of the poor, foresee their hour as darkly written in the book of fate!

I do not mean to-day their power will fall, but that the seed hath been already sown which shall at harvest bear their bitter doom.

I cannot more fitly close this present paper than by appending a few original lines, addressed to America's great and glorious Infidel son, the man who, more than any other of the present day, has struck from the brain of our age the shackle of cunning priestcraft; the prince of moving eloquence, whose words stir the heart like subtlest melody, our illustrious fellow-countryman,

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

High priest of eloquence! Where gilded sham
Lifts her false crest in all the lands of earth,
Wing'st thou thy Pythian shafts with eagle glance,
Hasting the dawn of liberty's glad birth!
Mover of hearts! Where'er down-trodden man
His vain appeal makes to the heedless sky
Thy voice is raised to mock that phantom host,
Proclaiming sacred truth's arch-majesty!
Herald of hope! albeit yon servil pack,
Religion's hirelings—cavil at thy creed,
Bartering conscience for vile pittance, wrung
From nature's weak fears, and faith's uncertain need.
Thou wilt not swerve, nor deign to turn thee back
To crush such feeble foe, but 'pon the front
Of this new age grave "Light!" thy lasting monument!

Those Christian Judges.

The statement of the Christian at Work, Dr. Talmage's paper, that five of the present judges of the Supreme Court of the United States are church-members has only tended to confirm the allegation of "Antichrist" that before the retirement of Judge Strong he was the only member of the court who believed in the divine origin of Christianity. After the Christian at Work made the counter allegation, a correspondent of the New York Sun, from Newark, N. J., the home of Judge Bradley, wrote thus: "Aliunde Joe is put down as an elder in the Reformed church. Great Scott! You ought to hear him cuss once when in a passion!" Then came the announcement that Chief-Justice Waite had dined with Lord Chief-Justice Coleridge on the piazza at Coney Island on the Sabbath, to the music of Gilmore's band; which caused the Christian Intelligencer to exclaim, "This example will fill God-fearing hearts with sorrow." And now the "Man of Sin" is credibly informed that Judge Field, who is put down by the Christian at Work as "a true blue Presbyterian," is, like Aliunde Joe, given to cussing. We might hav bet two to one on it at a venture, for Pacific judges and statesmen are generally addicted to profanity.

This disposes of all the judicial church-members prior to the retirement of Judge Strong. As for the new incumbents, Blatchford ("Episcopalian") and Gray ("Channing Unitarian"), we are not informed how they stand on the question of the divine origin of Christianity, or whether either of them is prone to profanity. If Judge Gray, like some Bostonians, appreciates "cultyah," the presumption is that he neither swears nor laughs audibly. Nor would we venture to suspect Judge Blatchford guilty of anything more than causing other people to swear, as he did when he denied the appeal of D. M. Bennett.

Morality and Religion.

From the North American Review.

The man who does not accept the doctrins laid down by the authorities of the Christian church is set down as an "unbeliever," and the church has heretofore so denominated the sentiment of society as to make it a term of reproach. It is ceasing to be so. The most intelligent, the most cultivated, and the most conscientious members of the community are coming more and more to reject the doctrins still deemed essential in the church, while their character for virtue and respectability has to be recognized. Doubt very naturally arises as to whether religious belief has any necessary connection with moral conduct; whether, in fact, the so-called believer is any better than the so-called unbeliever.

In the first place, the difference between them is not that one believes and the other does not believe, but that they do not believe alike, and that their belief has not the same foundation. We dispute the right of the church believer any longer to cast reproach on the believer outside of the church, or to thank God that he is either better or safer than other men. But what do "unbelievers" believe? They believe as much in virtue and good morals as Christians of the "straitest sect." They believe in uprightness—righteousness, if you please—as best for mankind in this life and in any life to which they may be destined, and they believe in promoting virtue and uprightness by every means. But they believe that what is called the Old Testament scriptures is simply a mass of Hebrew literature, subject to the same canons of criticism that apply to any other collection of books. They believe that the judgment which selected these particular books and called them sacred was a fallible human judgment. They believe the Pentateuch to contain a purely mythical account of the creation of the world and the origin of the human race. They believe that the account of the origin and history of the Jewish people is mixed up with legend, much of it incredible. They believe the Mosaic law in all its details to be a human production, applicable to a particular people in a rude age, though it contains some moral precepts universally accepted. They believe the early Jewish idea of the deity to be a monstrous combination of the attributes of the heathen gods and the Oriental despots of the time, exalted by the genius of Moses, and varied from time to time by the priests and prophets of the Jewish people. They believe that the annals of the Hebrews contain a good deal of rubbish and some absolutely disgusting incidents, and that the whole mass is to be treated like any other literature of an ancient people. The prophets and psalmists, like the philosophers and singers of other nations, produced many things worthy of preservation and admiration, but nothing that should be exempt from a discriminating criticism. The people for whom the present writer speaks hav their belief about the Old Testament, as clear and positiv as that of the church.

So hav they of the New Testament. They regard that as a peculiarly interesting collection of literature, pertaining to the life and teachings of a singularly pure and enthusiastic preacher, who sacrificed his life to the intolerant spirit of the established theology of his time and who has exercised a wonderful influence over human history. They admire his character and his teachings, but believe that both hav been amazingly distorted. The record written up from tradition long after his death is, of course, imperfect. Superstition and credulity added much that would be rejected in any other old record, and should be in this. "Unbelievers" believe the gospels to be a crude and imperfect record, containing many errors of fact and much coloring of belief derived from writers who were not cognizant of the facts. They regard Paul and the apostles as the real founders of Christianity as a system, but they believe that Christianity as it now exists has been a growth, like every other system, whether of religion, politics, or philosophy—the work of man in the same sense in which government and the theories and methods of public administration are the work of man.

Those whom the church calls unbelievers found their belief on the study of nature and of man. It is made up of the best conclusions of human experience, human knowledge, and human study up to this point in the world's development. Those conclusions contradict most of the belief based on what is called revelation; consequently they cannot accept that revelation as divine or authoritativ. Do they believe in a God, in immortality, and in a future state of man? That depends on the definition of these terms and on the mental constitution of the believer. Few pretend to hav any positiv answer to make to unanswerable questions. They go as far in their conclusions as human knowledge and human reasoning can carry them, and there they stop. They hav no right to assume, save each for himself. They do not, like the church, claim a peculiar conclusivness or a peculiar sacredness for their assumptions, or try to impose them on others.

It makes no difference what men believe upon the doctrinal points of religion; they are no better or worse for believing or not believing. In other words, there is no connection between morality and dogmatic belief. A man may reject the doctrins of the church entirely and be just as virtuous, just as upright, just as good, and just as safe for all the chances of eternity as the most devout believer in them. The moral teachings of Christianity do not differ, in the main, from the moral teachings of philosophy. Unbelievers accept them, not as the result of revelation or the offspring of religion, but as the best deductions of human experience and thought. They are apart entirely from matters of doctrinal belief or religious worship, and just as good coming from Zoroaster as from Solomon, from Buddha as from Jesus, from Socrates as from Paul, from Shakspere as from Augustine. The question does not directly concern what the church has done or is doing as an organization for the good of humanity. If our position is sound, it could do just as much without its dogmas, and its power to do it is not dependent on its system of doctrinal belief; or the same good could be done by a human organization otherwise founded. Moreover, the unbeliever in Christian doctrins, as we hav defined his position, must not be confounded with the class which does not think at all and which has no belief of any kind. This class, being ignorant and unintelligent, is apt to be vicious, but it is not usually graced with the epithet of Infidel. It is subject to superstition and given to credulity; it is moved by appeals to the hopes and fears, and it may be that the church in the peculiar character of its teachings still serves a useful purpose in improving the lives and conduct of the lower ranks of humanity. Perhaps the philosophy of the unbeliever could not or would not directly reach and elevate them, though it may be claimed that methods which elevate the race as a whole bring up the very lowest layers and let light into the darkest places. The results of scientific study and of progressiv thought enlighten the every-day common sense of the people, and it is not merely the student and thinker who refuses to be a believer, in the sense imposed upon the wcrd by the church. The mass of the people are coming more and more to reject the old dogmas, and less and less to need them.

Systems of theology in the past have been the product of human need in the lower stages of mental and moral development, and they hav served their purpose in the progress of civilization. To-day, theology is in the rear of thought and not in the van. It holds to worn-out dogmas, potent in times of ignorance and superstition, impotent in the light of science and philosophy. The latter are destroying religious belief as it has been held in the past, and the result is not a lower standard of moral conduct. To the man who reasons clearly, the promises and threats of religion are futil, and it is through promises and threats that it has done its work. Such a man can govern his own conduct and try to improve others without these. We hav reached the stage where society generally can do without them; they are losing their effect, and agencies of moral support and improvement can be made quite as effectiv without any regard to the doctrins that are now held by the church as essential to salvation. The belief of the "unbeliever" is as good for the moral well-being of man as the belief of the Christian.

Nor do we ignore the needs of what is called the spiritual nature of man, or, more accurately speaking, his emotional nature. But we contend that the highest intellectual view of the life and destiny of mankind, a view based on knowledge and reason and requiring no other revelation, givs room for the loftiest development, the fullest exercise, and the amplest sustenance and support for that part of man's nature usually denominated spiritual. To admit that it requires a belief which intelligence and reason do not accept would be equivalent to holding that delusion is necessary to the comfort and consolation of the human soul.

What we contend for is simply this: The position of unbelief in the distinctiv dogmas of the Christian church to-day is the result of scientific investigation and critical study, and is generally accepted, not only by students and thinkers, but by the intelligent common sense of the mass of mankind. It is strengthened by every advance in discovery and in that philosophy which is the outcome of human knowledge. The prevailing type of Christianity, on the other hand, clings to superstition and credulity as the basis of its influence. It will not, so far as it can help it, permit common sense to assert itself in the place of unreasoning faith in the dreams of the olden time. The consequence is that the church is losing its hold on the convictions of men and on the conscience of the community. The belief that is founded on scientific conclusions and common sense affords as solid a basis for moral character and as firm a support for virtue as belief in the religious doctrins of the past or present. It is not denied that the church, as an organization, has done and is doing good to humanity, nor is it claimed that it makes no difference what a man believes, or whether he believe anything, in matters of ethics. But it is claimed that if the church abandoned its outworn creeds, and gave up old superstitions about divine revelation, vicarious atonement, salvation by faith, and future retribution, it could do far more good by reaching and elevating a larger number of people. It is certain that if it does not keep up with the mental progress of the race, it will fall behind in moral progress, and will lose its influence upon the intelligent and thinking part of mankind.

F. A. KIDDER.

The Liberal Club.

It is probable that when Mr. Benjamin R. Tucker set himself about the work of translating Michael Bakounine's "God and the State" he had no idea of the amount of discussion the book was destined to bring about at the Manhattan Liberal Club. If he had he might hav thought twice about the advisability of completing his task. As was noted last week, Mr. Samuel P. Putnam introduced Bakounine to the club on the evening of the 9th. On the 16th Mr. T. B. Wakeman gave his views of the same individual and his doctrins. Mr. Wakeman held up a small likeness of Bakounine, and described it. He was a man of Titanic build, with a head like that of Jove, containing the brain of a philosopher, and with a heart full of love for the human family. He was an exile from every land, hunted like a wild beast, a price put upon his head, homeless and friendless, yet feared, and the czar of all the Russias trembled when his name was spoken. Such was Michael Bakounine, the founder of Nihilism and the apostle of Anarchy. Mr. Wakeman then went on to giv an outline of how mankind progressed by continuous differentiations and integrations, each differentiation being necessary to the integration that was to follow it, and each integration being a higher one than any which had preceded it. Bakounine was an apostle of differentiation or breaking up; but if he had lived to see the success of his iconoclastic work in Russia, he would hav immediately begun the reconstruction of the empire under a higher spiritual power. The work of men like Bakounine was necessary to the higher integration, which, by prevision, Bakounine forefelt and shadowed forth in his little work on "God and the State." The saddest part of that book was the end, which is in these words by the editor: "Here the manuscript ends." Was that all, Mr. Wakeman asked, which Bakounine had to say? If not, what was kept back? Mr. Wakeman believed it was the gospel of the new integration. The lecture was concluded by an appeal to Liberals to unite with one of the political parties in such a way as to make themselvs felt in politics. Either this, or all the minor parties, Greenbackers, Socialists, Antimonopolists, the Labor party, etc., should combine on a platform upon which they all could agree, and embodying the essential demands of all reformers. Only in this way could they make their existence known to the political world.

Socialist Langerfelt was the first critic. As he came forward from the rear of the hall it was noticed that he had changed the swift stride which has formerly characterized his method of approaching the platform for a more subdued process of locomotion. He argued that political and religious equality had been achieved. The third factor necessary to human happiness was economic equality. This was what State Socialism looked forward to. Mr. Wakeman was a book-worm, and was altogether ignorant of the practical side of the question.

Mr. Samuel P. Putnam followed, and made a rattling good speech. He said that his critics and those who criticised Mr. Wakeman lost sight of the real questions, and set up men of straw, which they amused themselvs with knocking about. When he demanded liberty for himself he demanded the same liberty for everyone else, and his liberty was bounded by that of others. He discountenanced brute force where the abolition of any evils was possible by peaceable means. So long as people were left free to reason and educate wrong out of existence, it was folly and crime to resort to violence. Mr. Putnam was heartily cheered.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., in a neat and lucid speech, explained that the difference between the previous speakers arose in great measure from a misapplication of terms. The word "anarchy" was associated in the general mind with violence and riot. While this was the case, it was hardly appropriate for Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Putnam to call themselvs Anarchists. "Integralists" was a better term. Unlike some speakers, the young doctor does not attempt to make a five-minute speech occupy ten; and, what is perhaps as praiseworthy, he makes no effort to crowd a half-hour's talk into ten minutes. These conspicuous merits of Dr. Foote go far with impartial people to offset the habit of punning, to which, in private life, he is known to be addicted.

Mr. Chamberlain also recurred to the misuse of words. He spoke of an old settler in the West who returned home one night to find his home in ashes and his hearth-stone a scene of carnage. The Indians had been there. As the aged pioneer gazed, weeping, upon his disarranged domestic appurtenances, he exclaimed in agonized tones, "This is too ridiculous!" This inappropriate recourse to the word "ridiculous," Mr. Chamberlain maintained, was due to a lack of knowledge as to its correct use. The word "anarchy" had been similarly misused by the speakers.

Mr. Cohen said that it was supposed to be the custom for speakers at the club to criticise, favorably or unfavorably as the case might be, the arguments presented by the lecturer of the evening. Mr. Langerfelt had not done this, and he could not understand why that gentleman should persist in introducing ulterior matter. He agreed with Mr. Putnam in deprecating brute force. He would secure his rights peaceably if he could, forcibly if he must. He advised his hearers to use peaceable means first, and assured them that the other method would follow.

Mr. King next occupied as much of the floor as his physical capacity would permit, and as much of the attention of the audience as by his oratorical attainments he was enabled to secure. He accused Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Putnam of having misrepresented Bakounine and deceived their hearers, and read an extract from "God and the State," which, he held, supported that accusation. They were kid-glove anarchists such as Bakounine heartily despised and would hav nothing to do with. Wakeman knew little about practical anarchy; he was dishonest and shallow. Mr. Wakeman, during Mr. King's little splurge, gazed upon that diminutiv young gentleman with philosophical calmness, smiling occasionally like an intellectual sovereign amused with the buffoonery of a licensed jester. When Mr. King had concluded his remarks, however, Mr. Wakeman arose and, figurativly speaking, sat down upon him—gently, firmly, dispassionately, at first, but gradually increasing the emphasis. The sufferer emitted an occasional protest, but soon relapsed into silence. The speaker warned the working men with whom Mr. King is associated, not to trust him. He was a Jesuit, working for his own personal ends. He and Mr. Seering were the only representativs left of the purely Comtian school, and who acknowledged a Positivistic pope. Mr. Wakeman is a Positivist as well. He adopted, in a modified form, the teachings of Comte previous to that philosopher's attack of insanity. Mr. King accepts the doctrins which Comte promulgated subsequent to his mental collapse, and this is supposed to represent the difference between the two schools of Positivism. In reply to Mr. Langerfelt's charge that he was a book-worm, Mr. Wakeman held that there was a possible chance for a man who had studied many books to know as much as a person who had never looked inside of one. The speaker closed with an impressiv appeal in behalf of science, whose teachings should be accepted as though the last gospel revealed to man from the very heavens themselvs.

Mr. Andrews did not take part in the discussion, possibly for the reason that next month he intends to lecture on the subject of anarchy and individuality, making, as usual, a summing up of the arguments popular to all sides. Each succeeding meeting of the Liberal Club seems attended with increasing interest, albeit Mr. Shook continues to absent himself from the weekly gatherings. Friday evening, the 23d, Mr. P. S. M. Monroe will lecture.

The Boston Liberal Club.

"The Immediate Dangers that Threaten the Republic; or, Democracy versus Anarchical Despotism," was the subject discussed last Sunday morning in the Investigator Hall by the members of the Boston Liberal Club. The theme was introduced by Dr. E. V. Wright in a well-delivered essay, in which it was endeavored to be shown that the evils under which our repulic has to-day to labor are all due to the fact that vast sums of money ad property hav gravitated to the hands of a very few ndiv iduals. The essayist has been engaged for some time in the anti-monopoly political ranks, and from the experience which he had gained while fighting their battles he considered that the American government was a Pentarchy. Five men held between them wealth sufficient to exercise so weighty an influence upon the state and national legislatures that they were virtually the rulers of the land. He read a quotation or two from Joseph Cook and Jay Gould, and gave a brief outline of the history of the anti-monopoly movement, which he thought abundantly proved that the monopolists were themselvs the evil that was to be removed.

Mr. E. B. G. Hazzen thought that everything which existed, even to the monopolists, was the natural product of pre-existing causes. Monopolists could no more be avoided in the present condition of society than could leaves and fruit upon an apple-tree. There was, in his mind, but little doubt that in the ultimate constitution of society, millionaires, and even billionaires, would exist. But they would accumulate their wealth legitimately and distribute it righteously.

Mr. Joel Densmore did not think it possible that billionaires, or even millionaires, could rightly exist in a society which had solved the question of the equitable distribution of wealth.

Mr. Verity was not quite sure which side he ought to take in the debate. He had had considerable practice in riding two horses, still he always felt like attaching himself to one only. The trouble was that if he did so it was the wrong one. Then there was changing to the other, but that was also wrong, so perhaps he had better go on riding the two, especially as he found that there was good in each, and all the evil was not centered in either.

Mr. Horace Seaver supported Dr. Wright's position, and spoke in rather severe terms of opposition to Mr. Hazzen. It was monopoly that ruined the ancient republics of Greece and Rome, and if we continued permitting the accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few, while the many were left with scarcely the necessaries of life, the time might soon arrive for writing over our republic as over theirs: "It was and is not."

Mr. Mendum would like to know what would hav become of the country without the capitalists and the monopolists. The people could not be depended upon. They had not even sense enough to accept the proposition of the originators of the Paine Memorial, and thus they were very nearly losing this edifice. A few monopolists, however, came forward, and the building was saved. To them and not to the people is it due that we hav to-day in Boston a building dedicated to the dissemination of Liberal doctrins.

Messrs. David Kirkwood and Lysander Spooner followed. The first supported Dr. Wright, and the other thought that some valuable truths had been uttered by the essayist. But little new had been advanced by the others. In the past mankind had been held in subjection by the sword; to-day, by capital and monopoly. There could be no redress, no solution of the problem, until the science of justice was studied.

Luther's Anniversary.

From the Evening Post of November 10th.

The four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's birthday is celebrated to-day in Protestant Germany with much pomp and circumstance. He is unquestionably the greatest figure in German history, except Bismarck, and a man of much the same heroic mold. But it will not be possible to celebrate it without bringing into prominence the strange evanescence of much of his work. He was the foremost man in the extraordinary revolution which gradually raised the Bible, till then an unknown book, to be the rule of faith and morals during the next three centuries to a considerable portion of Christendom—and this was really a far greater feat than the overthrow of the Papal authority. For that overthrow, owing to the gross abuses and scandals of ecclesiastical rule, a large part of the Christian world was quite ready. Where the ability of the reformers, and above all of Luther, was most conspicuous was in providing a director of the conscience to take the place of the church, and in getting his countrymen to accept it. It is the constructiv part of the career which is really most wonderful, successful revolutionists are so much more common than successful builders.

But for any one who reads his story and considers his work, the fact that the great bulk of those who will to-day celebrate his achievements with pride as one of those of the greatest of Germans hav no more faith in his doctrins than he put in Tetzel's, and care no more for his Bible than he cared for the missal, is pathetic enough. In other words, to put it plainly, the birthday of the great reformer will to-day be honored in his own country mainly by people who never read his Bible and who sing his hymns rather as old war songs than as expressions of religious devotion. The truth is that there is now little religious belief of any kind to be found among the educated classes of Protestant Germany, and that Luther's reformation is in their eyes rather a step in the political and intellectual emancipation of the country than a phase of religious progress. Luther is to them a forerunner of Bismarck, in short, rather than the promulgator of a new creed, or the founder of a new church. They care very little about the nature or origin of his quarrel with the pope. What he managed to save out of the wreck of his old faith is no more valuable in their eyes than what he lost, and his Bible interests them rather as a specimen of old German than as a new spiritual lamp provided by him for the men of his time. Rome could not hav wished nor probably never expected a more complete failure of Lutheranism, in the sense in which Luther would hav wished the term Lutheranism to be taken, than has actually taken place.

But the failure is such that the church profits nothing by it. There is not much of his constructiv work left in Germany among the class which reflects on religious problems, but the spirit of free inquiry in which he carried it on has grown stronger than ever. The process which he applied to the papal authority is now applied to all subjects whatever. The Bible itself has to submit to the tests and questionings to which he subjected the pope and the counsels. This, were he to come on earth again, he would probably soon get to understand and even enjoy.

What he would probably never get to understand or enjoy would be the strong and growing disposition of his countrymen to think only of the things of this life, and to dismiss from their attention, as inscrutable and insoluble, those problems of the hereafter by which he and most thinking men of his time were mainly occupied. To this he probably never would be reconciled. The present generation of Germans hav not themselvs come to it suddenly. No generation could pass from Luther's state of mind to that of a modern German scholar in one bound, although in Germany the process has been quicker than elsewhere.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. Remsburg will lecture at Rockford, Ill., on Sunday Dec. 2d, at 3 and 8 o'clock, P.M., and on Monday evening, the 3d, at 8 o'clock. The lectures will probably be delivered at the opera house.

C. B. Reynolds, the writer of the articles on the New Testament, is soon to go into the lecture field. He is another ex-minister added to the ranks of Freethought orators. His eulogy of Mr. Bennett at the Rochester Convention was a most eloquent effort. His knowledge of the ins and outs of the church will be of great value to him in exposing that fraudulent institution. He brings to his work abilities of the highest order and the enthusiasm for liberty of the escaped slave. We are confident that Liberalism will find in him a most powerful advocate, and hope that he may be kept busy. His address is Rochester, N. Y.

Gerald Massey, the English poet, litterateur, and Egyptologist, delivered the first of his course of "archaic, revolutionary, and theosophic" lectures, at Chickering Hall, Friday evening, the 16th inst., before a small audience. The lecturer suffered from a severe cold, and was consequently in poor spirits and voice. The subject for the evening was, "Man in Search of His Soul During Fifty Thousand Years, and How He Found It." The thoughts of the audience were directed to a period of primitiv nature fifty thousand years anterior, by the speaker's system of calculation, to the present age. The religious customs of that time, and particularly the mode of burial, evidenced recognition of a human soul and desire to preserve it. It was plain, from an investigation of the peculiar rites of those early races—their apparent beliefs in regard to the origin of life, their careful preservation of the dead for the subsequent return of the soul to the body, with the idea of ultimate reproduction of life—that they had a conception of the soul and its immortality, and that the hypothesis of a divine revelation to succeeding races concerning the soul and its mission was not necessary to the continuity of a future life theory. The lecturer located the first soul and an idea of it (the thing being composed of red mud, typical of blood,) among the folks of fifty thousand years ago, and traced its evolution through seven distinct, though concatenatious stages—from the first and second, those of blood and breath, on up through the chain to the sixth and seventh, spiritual and immortal. He said that the individual of modern times was apparently more in doubt about his soul than primitiv man, who, it would seem, had a wonderfully clear idea in regard to that article, and was very precise in his preparation for its reunion with the body. With the latter, the preservation of the body after death was a basis of calculation as to the salvation of the soul. The audience was presented with the religious creeds of nearly every race of people, civilized and barbaric, on the face of the globe; and perhaps from no other source than Gerald Massey could the inquirer get a more complete knowledge of the bewildering diversity of views that hav been held by human beings since the beginning of time on this great question concerning the soul. The lecturer was of opinion that the immense variety of notions, absurd and otherwise, which had at different periods obtained in regard to the soul and a future life, could be traced to an abnormal condition of the mind, resulting from the excessiv use of wine, and to the trance state of the mentality. He briefly referred to phenomenal Spiritualism, and seemed to perceive in it some mighty truths, half hidden, half revealed, which possibly would be fundamental in the establishment for the future of a grander religion than had yet influenced humanity. The learned discourse was listened to attentivly throughout, and was certainly most instructiv, but there was hardly enough entertainment in it for a mixed audience.

The Problem of the Universe and Its Scientific Solution, with some Criticisms of Universology.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

I am glad that Mr. Andrews has presented his side of the question with such vigor. Those who are disposed to accept his solution of the universe cannot complain but what they have had a fair chance to see it, in all its wealth of meaning. Perhaps I am still blind. I have tried to explain Universology, but it seems that I have failed. I suppose that I do not possess the right organization, or that I must be "born again" before I can comprehend this new philosophy. I wonder if I must have a "sixth sense" in order to penetrate this secret. If so, I am lost beyond all redemption, for I never expect to discover any truth except by the use of my five senses. It seems as if some sort of faith were necessary to get a start in Universology, as faith is needed to get a start in the Christian religion. Once in a believing frame of mind, all is easy. The problem unfolds itself, and light springs at every step. Difficulties vanish, and the disciple marches along with triumphant soul. Alas! I cannot have that start; and, therefore, for the time being, I must dwell in darkness. But if the light ever does come, I will hasten to confess.

I will not try my hand again at Universology. I will simply re-state my own position. I appeal only to the intellect. I make no assumption. I begin only with what everybody declares. Mr. Andrews admits that to be true which I put at the base. He does not reject my corner-stone, though I may reject his superstructure. I cannot build so far and high as he. I cannot have such sky-pointing spires, flashing with many-colored lights. My building is a very humble one; but all admit that the ground on which I build is tenable.

Mr. Andrews says that I have shifted the matter in dispute, and have not stuck to the original question. I think I have. If I have made any change, it has been through a logical necessity.

The original question was, "What is Science?" The answer to this is, "Classified Knowledge." Mr. Andrews admits that this is a correct answer. In order, however, to understand this answer, we must inquire, What is knowledge? And in order to understand what is knowledge, we must know the origin of knowledge; and in order to discover the origin of knowledge, we must see the true relation of mind and matter, for in regard to the origin of knowledge, it makes all the difference in the world whether the mind comes before or after matter. If the mind comes before, then matter in its contact with mind is simply the occasion of knowledge, while if mind is the result of matter, then material sensation is the cause of knowledge. In the one case, matter is a mere instrument; in the other it is an initial force. In the one case it evokes, and in the other it begins.

Take the old doctrine of Plato, that human knowledge is simply reminiscence; that is, a remembering of what the mind knew in former stages of existence. Plato assumes that the mind always existed, and therefore always knew, for mind is essentially intelligence; therefore the baby really knows as much as the man, only he does not remember, and he grows in knowledge by enlarging his memory. Material sensation does not originate ideas, it only stirs the mind to remembrance. Matter, therefore, is the occasion by which old ideas recur, but it is not the cause of fresh intelligence.

This shows that, in order to get at the origin of knowledge, we must, first of all, settle the relation of mind and matter, else we cannot decide whether knowledge is merely reminiscence, or a new thing. Are we simply living life over and over again, traveling an everlasting circle, or are we actually new beings; and does knowledge begin with our present existence? We must discuss this question, and settle it; and I claim that it has been settled so far as science is concerned. Philosophers may still dispute, or refuse to dispute, and call it a "drawn game," but scientists affirm that matter is the beginning, and mind the result, and it is in the light of this determination that we must settle every question.

The whole spirit of science is toward unity; it seeks to resolve every force into one force. This is the goal of all analysis. Science goes from the complex to the simple; the more simplicity it finds, the more satisfaction it finds. It never will explain the universe by two things, but eventually by one. The correlation of forces is perhaps the most far-reaching and astonishing discovery of the human mind. In it lies an untold wealth of achievement. Science is repugnant to dualism. The many changing phenomena must at the last have one fountain. Philosophy and religion recognize this. Every philosophy that has ever existed has been an attempt to explain the universe by some one principle. This is what makes a philosophy, as Mr. Harris says. It is a search for unity.

What philosophy and religion desire instinctively, the intellect demands. The progress of science has been toward this unity. To detect resemblance is the sublimest triumph of analysis, and it is the finding of an underlying likeness in the midst of mighty contrasts that has enabled the human mind to conquer nature, and harness its flying forces. When Franklin discovered that the remote flashes in the sky were like the little electric sparkles about his fingers, an infinite wealth of power was made known. When the spectroscope reveals that the constituents of the stars are like those of our own earth, vast possibilities of knowledge flash before the mind. When man is ignorant, he sees the differences of things, and all is disorder; but when he grows wise, he sees the sameness of things, and hence exults in the harmony of law.

Mr. Andrews cannot call the human mind from this supreme battle-ground. It will stay there until the issue is reached, and liberty is proclaimed.

Hitherto, in the Platonic and similar philosophies, the unity has been reached by the sacrifice of matter and the enthronement of mind. Mind has been the one substance, and matter its creation.

This solution is no longer satisfactory. It does not agree with the facts of the case, and hence the other solution must be adopted, and matter taken as the one substance, and mind a result.

This is the inevitable conclusion, unless one adopts the neutral position of Mr. Andrews; but it is impossible for the scientist to accept any such refuge. He must decide. His intellect compels him to decide. It allows no divided allegiance. Science will not rest until it has correlated all forces and expressed their absolute unity. Take away this goal of human thought and the life of science passes, for the breath of science is the desire for unity. Science hesitates not at this question. It decides firmly and instantly that matter comes first and mind afterwards.

No one but a fool disputes the existence of the material universe. No one disputes but that it existed long anterior to man, and before this planet assumed its present habitable form. No one disputes but that matter has always existed, and always will exist. If these are assumptions, they are assumptions made by everybody.

I will not argue with one who takes the position that we do not know that matter exists. I might as well argue with an idiot. Matter does exist, and we know it. It has always existed independent of man. Man did not make it. Before he breathed it was. It is to-day, and it ever will be. Call it simply existence, if you wish—but we cannot conceive of existence except in material forms; and therefore for science existence is material existence.

This is the indisputable starting-point, the eternity of matter. It is unbeginning and unending.

Now, the next question to decide is this: Is mind equally eternal with matter—a separate entity? or is it the result of matter?

When we say that matter is eternal, we mean that the substance of matter, whatever that is, is eternal; not that any of its forms are eternal. We cannot define the substance of matter. We only know that it is. But the phenomena of matter are forever changing. They come and they go; the mountains, and the seas, and the stars pass from form to form. Nothing abides. The universe is not static; it is dynamic. It is always on the move. But while the appearance changes, matter substantially remains. It never increases; it never decreases.

Can we make the same affirmation of mind? I say, No; mind is not a substance; it is simply phenomena; it is a manifestation. We cannot make it identical with pure existence, for it has no independent life. We cannot conceive of it as existing in itself, while we can so conceive of matter. The exhibitions of mind, as we know it, are limited. They begin and they end. Matter exists throughout all space and time. It flashes in millions of stars. Motions come to the eye to-day; they started on their course before humanity had a being. As Science sweeps the endless heavens with its telescopic glance, it continually discovers matter, but not mind; there is no evidence of what we call intelligence. There is simply orderly force; but orderly force is not mind—it is law. The existence of law does not indicate mind. Law is not a thing; it is a mode, and this mode always has been—always will be. The movement of the stars, the wondrous magnificence of their procession, does not indicate anterior mentality. If law began to be, I grant that the supposition of a mind to begin it would be reasonable; but as the law never began, mind as a cause is superfluous, and therefore, to the eyes of Science, there is no such thing.

We only know mind as it exists on this earth, in a very limited space. What thinker has the temerity to declare that the human mind, as such, has always existed? All that the transcendentalist dares to affirm is, that a mind is eternal, of which the human mind is but a part. But this is a tremendous assumption—that the human mind is part of the mind of the universe. Of course we like to think that our minds are a part of an infinite mind. In this way we satisfy our egotism. But the only mind that science admits to exist is the human mind. And therefore all that science knows of mind is of a limited and finite manifestation—a manifestation always coming from certain organized forms of matter, and from no other. The source of mind is protoplasm. This is amply demonstrated; but protoplasm is not a simple substance. It is made up of other substances. Therefore, even before there can be a possibility of mind, something must be manufactured in the laboratory of nature. Mind is not a substance, therefore it is a mode only. It is not universal, but partial. Wherever there is existence, there is matter; but only in certain choice forms of existence is mind exhibited. Destroy protoplasm, and you destroy mentality. Let human intelligence entirely vanish; what we call the material universe would still exist.

The only possible way to escape the force of this reasoning is to affirm that we know the outside universe solely through mental action; that is, we infer the existence of the material universe from the operation of the mind. We only know mind directly, it is said, and from that direct knowledge we reason to the existence of the universe itself. This seems a very plausible assertion, and if true, of course mind is the reality, and matter the shadow. But what mind is the reality? Simply my own mind. The universe I infer, and Mr. Andrews, and all other minds I infer. I don't know that the universe exists, and I don't know that Mr. Andrews exists. I only know that I exist. Mr. Andrews is the shadow of a shadow, the inference of an inference. This is simply nonsense. It is melting the whole universe into my own individuality, and my ego is the beginning and end of all. Science revolts against this pure idealism which is destructiv of all knowledge, for if I don't know that the outward universe exists, then I don't know that I myself exist. I only know that something is "going on," that's all; it may be myself, it may be some other "ego." I "infer" myself, but I don't know myself; and if I don't know myself, then I don't know anything. But if I know myself, then, in the very act of knowing myself, I know the outward universe. If I do not infer myself, then I do not infer the objective reality. In the very act of consciousness the "I" and the "not I" mingle and flash in one cognition. The moment I know myself, that very moment I know the world about me. I know that this table on which I write exists; I know it as well as I know that my mind thinks. I know that the stars exist, and that they exist outside of, and independent of, any operation of my mind. I know that Mr. Andrews exists. He is not a mere mode of my ego, but an objective reality. Of course many of the forms and relations of the outside world are discovered by a process of reasoning, but the fundamental reality is not so discovered. The objective reality is directly and instantly cognized with the subjective. As I said before, and as Mr. Andrews admits, there is no priority. Mind and matter are known together and in contact. Mind is not known first, and then matter; not matter, and then mind; but both are known in the primal cognitive act, the one as much as the other.

From this starting-point we reason, and the moment we begin to reason we are driven to the conclusion that matter is the substance, and mind the mode; for matter confronts us everywhere, while mind only confronts us at certain points, and in certain forms of matter. We never see it existing in and of itself. Must we not, then, admit that mind is a result, and, in tracing the origin of knowledge, must we not do so in the light of this conclusion; and is it not apparent that in order to understand the source of knowledge we must, first of all, decide as to the relations of mind with matter? If we allow this question to go unsettled, we are all in a muddle, and have no certain guide. We are in mists and fogs, and have only glimpses of the truth; but the moment we decide that mind is the result of matter, the mists and the fogs clear away; the genesis of knowledge is at once defined, and the problem of the universe, instead of being a fantastic puzzle, begins to assume a logical shape, and verges to a reasonable solution.

Let it be distinctly understood what we mean by saying that mind is the result of matter. We do not mean that it is a form of matter. Mind is not matter, however subtile and ethereal. Neither is it a property of matter, or quality, or attribute. Neither is it an entity or thing. It is simply a process. It is a movement, an activity. The soul of man is not a substance; it is action, action, action; wonderful, magnificent, far-reaching, piercing, and penetrating; but action, and nothing more. Why this action, called mind, results from certain organizations of matter, is more than we can tell. That problem at present is not solved. It may be, eventually. But the difficulties are immensely simplified the moment we admit that mind is a process, and not a thing.

Bacon and Shakspere.

The discovery that Lord Bacon wrote the "sonnets" to the earl of Essex in 1590 was so sudden and stunning that "Antiquary" wondered whether anyone had ever hinted at it before. It appears not, for in George Wilkes's "Shakspere from an American Point of View" (Appleton & Co., 1882), is this sentence:

"Such was Bacon, for whom the Baconians claim that he possessed more of education, wit, emotional elevation, and moral fitness for the production of such intellectual light as beams through the plays before us, than the man to whom these plays hav always been ascribed, and who indisputably wrote 'Venus and Adonis,' the 'Sonnets,' and 'Lucrece.'"

Mr. Wilkes, by the way, insists with plausibility that Shakspere was a Catholic. His father, John Shakspere, certainly was; and the external evidence in regard to William is the positiv declaration of the Rev. Dr. Davies, founded on documentary evidence furnished to him as a legacy by another clergyman who knew Shakspere, that he was born and died a Papist.

In regard to Shakspere's physiognomy, Mr. Wilkes thinks there is little, if any, doubt that he was red-haired, and probably freckled. Shakspere must go.

ANTIQUARY.

Paul's Further Hearing before Festus.

The American Bible Society, as well as the British, interprets the words "after two years" to mean that Paul was a prisoner at Cesarea two years under Felix; for just at that point the marginal date skips from A.D. 60 to 62. But Rabbi Wise, after persuading himself that Paul was Acher, who lived from about A.D. 30 to 117 or later, says that the "two years" point to the gubernatorial term of Albinus, A.D. 62–64 (p. 503).

"And Felix, that he might do the Jews a favor, left Paul a prisoner" (xxiv, 27).

This "most excellent Felix" was followed to Rome by leading Jews of Cesarea, who accused him before Nero; but through the influence of his brother Pallas, who was a friend at court, the deposed procurator escaped punishment (Jos. Ant., xx, 8, § 9).

The year of Felix's recall is not so certain as Smith's Bible Dictionary asserts. Josephus, in his autobiography, says:

"When I was in the 26th year of my age [A.D. 62 or 63] it happened that I took a voyage to Rome, and this on the occasion which I shall now describe. At the time when Felix was procurator of Judea there were certain priests of my acquaintance, and very excellent persons they were, whom, on a small and trifling occasion, he had put into bonds and sent to Rome to plead their cause before Cæsar. These I was desirous to procure deliverance for, and that especially because I was informed that they were not unmindful of piety toward God, even under their afflictions, but supported themselvs with figs and nuts" (Life, § 3).

Josephus tells us that he was born in the first year of the reign of Caius (Caligula), which began March 16, A.D. 37. He therefore entered his 26th year some time between March 16, A.D. 62, and March 16th following. A voyage to Rome in the winter season in those days was impracticable; and the account given of the shipwreck shows that Josephus sailed in the summer-time. It was, therefore, probably A.D. 62, though possibly after the opening of navigation in 63. His description of the shipwreck we will consider hereafter.

The reader will note the singular circumstance, that Josephus went to Rome A.D. 62 or 63 to intercede for certain very excellent priests of his acquaintance, who were put into bonds by Felix and sent to plead their cause before Nero. With this close approximation to the time and circumstances of Paul's alleged transportation to Rome, we propound the following inquiries:

1. Has any Christian scholar claimed that Paul was one of the prisoners for whom Josephus interceded?

2. Will anyone deny that Paul was a pharisee like Josephus?

3. Are we to infer that Felix expected a bribe also from these priests, who were so poor that they had to liv on figs and nuts?

4. Can any rational man believe that Josephus delayed the intercession for his brethren in bonds two whole years after Felix's departure—much less seven years, if McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia is right in dating the recall of Felix A.D. 55?

"And when Festus arrived at Cesarea he, after three days, went up to Jerusalem" (xxv, 1).

We are constrained to believe that Festus did not go to Judea until A.D. 62, as Ushur Michaelis, Eichhorn, Oldhausen, and the Bible societies hav fixed it. He arrived at a time when the Sicarrii were most numerous and turbulent. These he put down, and there is no evidence that his procuratorship lasted two years. On the contrary, we should infer from the brief account that Josephus givs of him that he was in Judea only a few months at most. His acts are all described in a single paragraph and two lines of another, in the "Antiquities" (xx, 8, § 10, 11), and in less than two lines of the "War" (ii, 13, § 1). He died in office, and doubtless quite suddenly.

"And the chief priests and the head men of the Jews made representations to him concerning Paul. And they petitioned him, asking of him the favor that he would send for him to come to Jerusalem, they placing an ambush to slay him by the way" (2, 3).

Can any sensible person imagin such conduct possible on the part of the chief priests and head men of Jerusalem? At this very time Josephus was either in Rome, or on his way, or preparing to go there, to plead for the release of certain priests who were put into bonds by Felix. Would the chief priests at Jerusalem, whose brethren were in bonds at Rome, hav prejudiced their cause by such an act of treachery to the new governor, Festus? Would they seek to assassinate a Jewish prisoner on his way to be tried before themselvs, after procuring the favor of a change of venue from Cesarea, a Greek town, to the chief city of the Jews?

"But Festus made answer: Paul is in custody at Cesarea, whither I am in haste to go. Therefore, let those among you who are able go down with us and make presentment of every offense there is in the man. And when he had been there eight or ten days he came down to Cesarea. And the next day he sat on the tribunal and commanded Paul to be brought. And when he came the Jews who had come from Jerusalem surrounded him and preferred against him many and weighty charges. Meanwhile Paul maintained that he had committed no offense, either against the Jewish law, or against the temple, or against Cæsar. But Festus, because he was disposed to conciliate the Jews, said to Paul: Wilt thou go up to Jerusalem, and there be tried before me for these things? Paul replied and said: I stand before Cæsar's tribunal; here I ought to be tried. Against the Jews I hav committed no offense, as thou also well knowest. If I had committed any crime or done anything worthy of death I would not refuse to die. But if none of the things of which they accuse me is upon me, no one may sacrifice me to their pleasure. I announce an appeal to Cæsar" (4–11).

Query: Why did he delay this appeal so long, if he had been in custody two years? Did he not tell the Ephesians that after visiting Jerusalem again he must see Rome? (xix, 21). Did not the prophet Agabus tell him that the Jews would bind him hand and foot and deliver him over to the gentiles? (xxi, 11). And did not the Lord say to him, "As thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem so also art thou to testify at Rome?" (xxiii, 11). With such a destiny before him, would he hav patiently endured two years' suspense and imprisonment at Cesarea?

"Then Festus conferred with his counselors and said: Hast thou declared an appeal to Cæsar? Unto Cæsar shalt thou go. And when some days had passed, Agrippa the king and Bernice came down to Cesarea to salute Festus" (12, 13).

This was Herod Agrippa II., the son of Herod Agrippa I., who died A.D. 44. Agrippa II. was at first assigned the kingdom of Chalcis about A.D. 50; then in 52 his tetrarchy was extended, but did not embrace Judea, and he received the title of king. He was a renegade Jew, and his sister Bernice was the Lucretia Borgia of the Herodian family (Farrar's St. Paul, appendix, 738). Agrippa II. died A.D. 100.

"And when they had been with him [Gr. many] days, Festus related to the king the case of Paul, saying:" (14).

It is unnecessary to repeat Festus's repetition of the case, except the last sentence, which we parallel in the two versions:

Syriac.	Greek.
"But he requested to be reserved for a trial before Cæsar; and I ordered him to be kept till I could send him to Cæsar" (xxv, 21).	"But when Paul had appealed to be reserved unto the hearing of Augustus, I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar" (Ibid).

The Greek for Augustus is Sebastos, with the definit article prefixed in this case. The revised New Testament has, instead of Augustus, "the emperor," but says in a note, "Gr. the Augustus."

When Octavianus became emperor, being of an obscure or mean family, he took by adoption the name Cæsar, and afterward the senate conferred on him the honorary name, Augustus. It is said that other emperors assumed this epithet, signifying "the august," "the venerable." But is there any proof that it was assumed by Nero? We believe that here is another trace of Paul in the reign of Augustus, which proper name the compiler of Acts did not change. But the Syrian scribe was cunning enough to substitute Cæsar, while the Greek translator, following the Aramaic original, wrote Sebastos. The Latin Vulgate also has Augustus, which is always recognized as the peculiar and special title of the first Roman emperor.

"And Agrippa said: I should like to hear that man. And Festus said: To-morrow thou shalt hear him. And the next day came Agrippa and Bernice, with great pomp, and entered the house of trials, with the chiliarchs and chiefs of the city. And Festus commanded and Paul came. And Festus said: King Agrippa, and all persons present with us: Concerning this man whom ye see, all the people of the Jews applied to me at Jerusalem, and also here, crying out that he ought no longer to liv. Yet on investigation I found that he hath done nothing deserving death. But because he requested to be reserved for the hearing of Cæsar [Gr. ton Sebaston, "Augustus"], I hav ordered him to be sent. And I know not what I can write to Cæsar in regard to him" (22–26).

Here is another change by the Greek translator or scribe: For Cæsar (or Augustus) in the last instance, the Greek codices hav to kurio, "the Lord," translated "my Lord," and so also in the Vulgate. Now, the title Kurios, "Lord," both Augustus and Tiberius absolutely refused; but the succeeding emperors were not so modest, says Adam Clarke, and Nero would hav it. Hence you see why the Greek scribe, not wishing to repeat Augustus or Cæsar too often, wrote in the last instance to kurio.

"And therefore I wished to bring him before you [all], and especially before thee, King Agrippa; that when his case shall hav been heard, I may find what to write. For it is unsuitable, when we send up a prisoner, not to designate his offense" (26, 27).

The compiler forgot that he had just made Festus say: "On investigation I found that he had done nothing deserving death." Now he makes the procurator order a re-hearing, after granting an appeal, so as to be able to find out what to write to Cæsar concerning the offense that the appellant is charged with!

What a brilliant magistrate! If comparisons were not "odorous," we might suspect Festus to be the prototype of Dogberry.

The Trial of Jesus.

Not more than one Christian in a hundred has ever read and carefully analyzed the accounts of the trial of Jesus, as related in the four evangelists. Neither of these four versions agree. One says, "Now, when the even was come, he [Jesus] sat down with the twelve," to eat the passover. After the passover he wandered out, doubtless knowing he was a marked man, and fearing some of his followers might betray him into the hands of Romans, against whose government the disciples of Jesus were conspiring. He sought the suburbs of the city, where he said to Peter and the two sons of Zebedee, "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death; tarry ye here and watch with me." His faithful followers fell asleep. He awoke them again, the second time, and was about to arouse them from a third slumber when Judas, who was hired to betray Jesus, gave the signal, and the young Jewish teacher was a prisoner. He was led before Caiaphas, the high priest (some authorities maintain that a high priest of that name never existed), where the scribes and elders were assembled. But Peter followed afar off to the high priest's palace, and went in and sat with the servants to see the end. Now, the chief priests and elders, and all the council, sought false witnesses against Jesus to put him to death. The high priest arose and said, "Answerest thou nothing?" Jesus said, "Hereafter ye shall see the son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven." Then the high priest rent his clothes (why should he rend his clothes?), saying, "He hath spoken blashemy; what think ye?" They answered, "He is guilty of death." The man who originally wrote this knew little of Jewish and nothing of Roman law. Jesus tried and condemned to death before a council of Jews! We must remember prisoners were never placed on trial at night, nor during the season of the passover. Again, the Jewish council had no legal right to try and pass sentence on a prisoner. This story was woven in the gloom of ancient monasteries, and spun from whole cloth.

The second account says: "And straightway in the morning [Matthew says at night] the chief priests bound Jesus and brought him before Pilate." Matthew says Jesus was tried and condemned to death by the council. This is a trial for a man's life. Not a single witness is produced. It is said the chief priests accused him of many things (why are they not stated?) but he answered nothing. Then Pilate said, "What will ye that I shall do unto him whom ye call the King of the Jews?" They answered, "Crucify him!"

New York city has had some judges who were not as pure as they might be, but I venture to say there is not a case on record where a judge ever appealed to a mob, a rabble, to ask instructions as to what he should do with a prisoner before him.

Pilate was a Roman governor, and he must conform to the laws of the Roman empire, which gave protection and justice to all. No such trial as related in the New Testament ever took place before a Jewish council or a Roman governor.

Fancy a learned judge, conversant with the law, turning to a crowd of excited and angry Jews to ask them what he should do with the prisoner charged with sedition or insurrection against the Roman empire.

Pilate, Roman governor though he was, would not dare giv over an innocent man to the blind fury of a mob.

WM. H. ROWAN.

New York, Nov. 12, 1883.

THE Independent takes a rather discouraging view of the religious outlook. Of the "week of prayer" that eminent journal draws this dark picture: "In a few weeks the churches will be holding a 'week of prayer;' but it is saddening to know in advance how feeble and spasmodic these gatherings will for the most part be. But few will gather at most; and those who do will feel the chill of death upon them, and will scarcely hold together long enough to get a blessing; and then it will all be over for another twelve months."

CALIFORNIA does not produce many Christians. Its "glorious climate" is too bracing. Bishop Wingfield told the general convention at Philadelphia that very few of the eighty millionaires of San Francisco are disposed to do anything for the cause of Christ or his church. There are forty-nine of American birth, eighteen Irish, eight Jews, five Germans, four English, and one French. "Only one is a member of a Protestant church. Mr. Flood is the only one who occasionally givs a few thousand dollars to the poor; and, of those who hav died, only James Lick has left a monument behind him worthy of a good name." The attempt to claim James Lick as a Christian is very ingenious and sly. It is a good specimen of religious dishonesty. But it will not do. Mr. Lick, as all the world knows, was an out-and-out Infidel, and such insinuations are only revelations of the inherent meanness of Christian "divines."

Figures that Signify Little.

The Independent amused itself last week by some fearful and wonderful figuring whereby all the Infidels, Spiritualists, Jews, Mormons, and "other classes besides the non-religious" in this country were ciphered out of existence, and none but Christians left to enjoy the milk and honey of a land peculiarly the Lord's own. After reading a lesson to the presumptuous Infidels who claim that orthodox Christianity is decreasing, and scolding the faint-hearted Christians who admit the claim, Mr. Bowen's paper comes down to cold figures, first advising both the above to get the church year books and census reports and study the question from them. Then it says:

"Those who, like Eli, are trembling for the safety of the ark, may be reassured and may thank God and take courage from these figures extracted from four pages of statistics carefully prepared for the Independent Almanac, which is shortly to appear."

Following this cheer is a table of figures, "carefully prepared," which foots up:

Churches in the United States - - -	115,610
Ministers - - - - - - - -	81,717
Communicants (members of churches) -	17,267,878

And the Independent sums up:

"Here we hav seventeen million and a quarter communicants, including the Catholic population, in a total population of 50,000,000. If we subtract the Catholic population from the seventeen millions we hav in round numbers 10,500,000 Protestant communicants. Three children and adherents to each communicant is not a large ratio. It is probably lower than the fact. Upon this basis the Protestant population is 42,000,000, to which add the Catholic population of 6,832,000, and we hav a total Christian population of 48,832,000, leaving the Jews, Mormons, and other classes besides the non-religious to make up the small balance of 1,000,000."

Now we know that there are altogether too many ministers and churches in the country, but we are not quite prepared to take the Independent's estimate; and as to the "adherents" which every communicant has attached we must also doubt. It proves too much. For instance. There being, in round numbers, 10,500,000 Protestant communicants, and each communicant having an appendage of three Christians, there are just 42,000,000 Protestants. Now the Catholics number (by the Independent's table, and the estimate is too low,) 6,832,000—in round numbers 7,000,000. Every one knows that the average Catholic has more "adherents," in the shape of children, than the average Protestant. But at the same ratio—three to each—this would giv 28,000,000, making the total population of this country to be 70,000,000—a number which even the Independent's arithmetician will hardly claim.

We know the answer the Independent will make is that the Catholics hav the habit of counting their children in as communicants, while the Protestants do not, but if the Protestants hav not counted some at least of their children in the above figures, we would like to know where the number of the denominations are obtained.

Every one who has been in the churches knows that it is their practice to add the minors to the church rolls as fast as they profess a "change of heart," and before they hav arrived at years of discretion. The Catholics count all the infants, and the Protestants count the sixteen and seventeen year olds who become obfuscated by the preaching of the hell and damnationists, and in the ignorance of their young hearts imagin they hav got religion. That is the only difference. And the Independent does not state how many dead people are upon the list of communicants; how many "moved away" and are beyond the cognizance of the churches which still keep their names on the roster to swell its size. Such cases are common, and the "moved away" people are often, when hunted out, found to be Freethinkers. We know some Infidels whose names are on the church lists in the places where they lived when young and pious. In another case, three letters to the officers of a church were necessary before a name was dropped. Of the activ supporters of Freethought a great many are men whose wives are church communicants, and these men are, therefore, counted by the Independent as "adherents" of Christianity, when the facts are they are doing all in their power to replace that system of theology with the truths of science.

The "ratio" of our religious contemporary is immensely too large, even if we allow its figures to stand. The Spiritualists alone number more than the million allowed to Infidels, Spiritualists, Mormons, and Jews. The Mormons number 200,000. The Jews count 250,000. At one time Spiritualism invaded the Catholic church to an extent that alarmed the priests and bishops, and in their speeches made against this belief the church authorities said there were 11,000,000 Spiritualists in this country. But this is undoubtedly an overestimate of the number of the outspoken ones. Those who secretly hold this belief are almost legion. Conversing the other day with a gentleman who has traveled this country very extensivly, he said: "What an immense number of Spiritualists there are! I meet them everywhere. Business men, church-members, those you would least expect it of, are firm believers in Spiritualism." These men of whom he spoke are counted in the ranks of the churches, when they really belong on the other side. But the outspoken Spiritualists can count in their ranks two or three times the million allowed for the four faiths by the Independent.

No accurate estimate of the Freethinkers can be given, for the organization of Freethought forces is yet in embryo. The only means of guessing, even, is by the number of names signed to the petition for the release of Mr. Bennett sent to Hayes. That contained 200,000 or more signatures. A good many of these, however, were of Spiritualists, and, to the credit of the church be it said, a few were of men who called themselvs Christians. Probably about 100,000 strong stand-up-and-die Infidels are scattered between Maine and California.

The strength of the Freethought movement lies, however, in the revolution it has worked in the churches, the rolls of which include innumerable heretics who, if found out, would be expelled, unless (as is undoubtedly the case in many places) the heretics were the most numerous. Heber Newton is a shining illustration. He is as much a heretic as ever Servetus was, but he found no orthodox John Calvin. Bishop Potter knew better than to entertain charges of heresy against Mr. Newton. While he knew that although the Episcopal church might contain as many members now as it did last year, and might even hav added to them, he also knew that the true Christian sentiment did not animate them. He knew that they were imbued with the spirit of rationalism, with heresy. He knew that more people than Heber Newton denied the inspiration of the Bible, and he dared not bring him to trial. He knew that it would be a trial of the Episcopal church, and not of Heber Newton. The work begun by Paine in this country has brought forth that measure of fruit. The rays of light from the "Age of Reason" hav gone into more than one church, and destroyed the belief in inspiration. Among the Congregationalists, the arithmetician has enrolled Henry Ward Beecher and his congregation. Can anyone with a knowledge of the meaning of words, with even an unabridged before him, class as Christian such a man as Mr. Beecher—an evolutionist, a denier of hell, the fall, and the atonement? And can even the most hopeful Christian imagin that two-thirds of his congregation are not as heretical as the pastor of Plymouth church?

Every evolutionist in or out of the church is an Infidel.

Every one who avows an unbelief in hell is an Infidel.

Every scorner of the fall and redemption myths is an Infidel.

Let the Independent figure up the number of these in the country, and it will hav the strength of Freethought. The enemies of Christianity are those of its own household. He would be a most consummate fool who should limit them to one million.

An Evangelical Revivalist.

The Boston Herald of Nov. 13th has five of its columns filled with an account of a glib-tongued revivalist in the orthodox churches throughout the New England states, who was a millionaire, a lawyer, a bigamist, a liar, a hypocrit, and a rascal of the deepest dye. And all this deviltry he carried on while he exceeded the mountebanks, John N. Maffit, of 1824, and Moody, of the present day, in the "Holy Ghost" power in getting up the old-fashioned Methodist style of revivals. His name was Henry F. Durant, and he died a few years ago, in Boston, and left an estate valued at five millions. He founded the Wellesley Female College, said to be the best ever known.

The details of all his "prayers" to the ridge-pole, and all the precious souls that the Holy Ghost through him converted from the error of their ways, together with all the lies he told, and all the women that he deceived and seduced, make up a conglomeration of both "God and the devil" that exceeds the crimes told of evangelical ministers by Mr. Billings. This "evangelical evangelist," as he was called, demonstrated, by his wonderful success in converting sinners, that he was a real Christian. His popularity was everywhere admitted, and crowds flocked to witness his eloquence in drilling sinners into the church. Let no uncharitable tongue, now that Henry F. Durant is dead, presume to say that he was not a good Christian, in view of the numerous revivals that everywhere followed his pulpit exercises. But alas, he made one fatal mistake! He ignored the claims of his legal wife and his only child in his will. And they hav now commenced suit for a right of dower and for a writ of entry to obtain possession of the remainder of his estate. In the light of the disclosures that his legal widow has been compelled to make of his hypocrisy and cruelty, no one can doubt that this millionaire, this eloquent revivalist, died filled with faith and with the Holy Ghost.

The Referendum.

Between the upper and nether millstones of the capitalists and the people, the last legislature of this state inaugurated a policy for which reformers hav long contended. Years ago we were secretary of a labor organization which had as one of the planks of its platform the "Referendum," or compulsory submission to the people for ratification of all laws passed by the legislature. The first application of that principle was made at our last election on the subject of convict labor. It was, however, not made as a matter of principle, but as a means of dodging for a season the responsibility of a direct vote on the question of abolishing the contract system in our prisons.

The time-serving politicians were afraid to reject the bill introduced for that purpose for fear the working people would leave them at home at the next election, and were equally afraid to offend the capitalists, who were unanimously in favor of the system by which they were coining the very lives of the convicts into money. It was voted to refer the whole subject to the people to get their opinion on it. The people voted to abolish the contract system by a vast majority. But as the present legislature is Republican, while the one which submitted the proposition to the people was Democratic, it is not probable that the system will be done away with this winter. The system is a conscienceless one, and subject to such outrageous abuses that it ought at once to giv place to a more humane and restorativ policy. While visiting Mr. Bennett, who was undergoing his martyrdom at Albany, we had a chance to see a little of it, and if Albany is a fair sample, our whole state prison management needs overhauling.

But it is the practical adoption of the Referendum principle that indicates progress. It is about the first time our Solons hav ever considered the people in their deliberations. When our laws are submitted to the public before final adoption it will be seen that monopolists and church parties hav lost their power. It would then be impossible for a few ministers from this city to lobby through an amendment to a penal code which subjected to a fine and imprisonment every bootblack, grocer, newsboy, butcher, milkman, baker, or other tradesman who should supply the necessities of his customers on Sundays. Despots of all sorts will be shorn of their power to harm, for public sentiment is becoming more and more enlightened, and the voting masses hav to a considerable extent substituted the discussion of principles for senseless hurrahing for political hacks. The Republican party grew to power because it was a reformation—it had an issue involving bed-rock principles affecting the country's welfare. It is rotting now because it has none. Its great opponent is just as badly off. Both avoid discussions of live questions for fear of the effect on the elections. There is a good opportunity for a new party, and in that party the Freethinkers should hav a loud voice. Let the workingmen follow up the legislature, and wring more concessions from the politicians. The good example set in this one instance should not be lost.

Joseph the Carpenter's Family.

MR. EDITOR: Please giv me the information to settle a dispute in which I hav become engaged on the following question: Did Mary, the mother of Christ, hav other children than him? Matthew xii, 55, 56 refers distinctly to the brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ; hence I claim that, according to the Bible, Mary, the mother of Christ, had sons and daughters. My opponent claims the opposit, that the Virgin Mary bore only Jesus Christ, he being begotten by God, and not having any brothers or sisters. We are both willing that your answer shall be final. Will you please answer this in your next TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige

Yours respectfully, COMMON SENSE.

"Common Sense" is right. The best authorities agree that, according to the New Testament, Jesus had brothers and sisters. But little or nothing, however, is known of them. Hegisippus, as quoted by Eusebius, says James, "the brother of the Lord . . . was surnamed the Just." Commentators hav tried to explain this James away by saying he was an apostle, not a brother, and also the rest of the family, by saying that Joseph was an old widower with four children, when he espoused Mary; but, as we said, the New Testament is explicit, and the best Biblical authorities agree that Jesus was only one of a numerous family.

A Catholic Demand.

On Sunday, the 11th, the New York Times, in an editorial discussing the Luther centenary, said that anyone who saw in the growth of the Catholic church in this country a cause for alarm, must be considered "mildly demented." On the 14th, to be consistent, the editor was obliged to say:

"It is very probable that some blunder has been made in the announcement, telegraphed from Rome, that 'the principal question discussed' at the meeting of the American prelates of the Roman Catholic church, held yesterday, 'was that of addressing a demand to the government of the United States that the relations between church and state shall be based upon canon law.'"

It is not at all surprising to those who hav paid attention to the history of Catholicism to read such a dispatch. It is safe to predict that some such demand will be made upon our government just as soon as the church thinks herself strong enough to command a hearing. Catholics, though naturalized, must always remain foreigners, owing to the nature of the ties by which they are bound to the church. They form a state within a state. The Vatican treats with European potentates, and has ambassadors at nearly all the courts. This government sends a minister to Berlin to look after the interests of American citizens in Germany. The pope sends one to look after the interests of his citizens, who, although living and owning homes in that country, still pay their highest allegiance to Rome, and are Catholics first, and Germans afterward. For a century or two even England had within her capital an accredited Romish ambassador, and the government treated with him the same as with the representativs of real nations. The fact that there are no relations of church and state now existing in the United States is no barrier to the consideration of the question of creating those relations. With John Kelly in the White House, and New York's Catholic rum-selling board of aldermen in Congress to do his bidding, it would not take Cardinal McClosky long to establish relations with our government. The salvation of our country at present is secured by the deadly hatred of the Baptists, Methodists, and Presbyterians for the Catholics, and by the antipathy of the various Protestant sects to one another. The tendency of Protestantism is to disintegrate. The adherents of the Romish church stick together, and at the present rapid rate of growth will, in another quarter of a century, become a very dangerous power. A great hullabaloo is made by the different sects over Mormonism, and a secret anti-Mormon league has been formed, but what are the Mormons, with their paltry 200,000 population, compared to the Catholic church with its 7,000,000? No one need be surprised at any seeming insolent demand made by Rome. She knows her power, and will be quick to exercise it when the times are ripe.

Cretinism.

MONTEZUMA, IOWA., Oct. 29, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please giv some account of a class of people, the dregs of humanity, and outcasts of the monasteries of southern Europe, called cretins. Col. Billings, in his "Prevention of Crime," partly describes them. Please let us hear from you, or some of your readers, on the subject.

M. BONE.

Cretinism is an idiocy peculiar to certain parts of countries which are metalliferous, occurring most frequently where iron and copper pyrites predominate. Generally the cretin is deaf and dumb, or able to utter only a hoarse cry. He is indifferent to cold and heat, and even to blows, and the most revolting odors. The most striking sign of cretinism is goitre, which is an enlargement of the thyroid gland on the front part of the neck. In England it is called a wen or "derby neck." The goitre s the beginning of that degeneration of which cretinism is the end. Shakspere called them "mountaineers, dewlapped like bulls, whose throats had hanging at 'em wallets of flesh." Pronounced cretinism is incurable. A pen picture of a cretin was given by Beaupre in a dissertation on the cretins published in 1855. He thus describes one:

"I see a head of unusual form and size, a squat and bloated figure, a stupid look, bleared, hollow, and heavy eyes, thick, projecting eyelids, and a flat nose. His face is of a leaden hue, his skin dirty, flabby, covered with tetters, and his thick tongue hangs down over his moist, livid lips. His mouth, always open and full of saliva, shows teeth going to decay. His chest is narrow, his back curved, his breath asthmatic, his limbs short, misshapen, without power. The knees are thick and inclined inward, the feet flat. The large head drops listlessly on the breast; the abdomen is like a bag."

Altogether the most disgusting creature conceivable—almost too revolting to describe.

Editorial Notes.

OUT of 23,000 prisoners confined during the year in the borough jail of Liverpool, 18,000 were Roman Catholics. Religion does not seem to restrain Liverpoolians from crime to any large extent.

SOME of the Democratic papers of Georgia asked Gov. McDaniels to refrain from mixing church and state, which he would do by issuing a Thanksgiving proclamation, but he paid no heed to the requests. The papers might retaliate by paying no heed to him when he again runs for office.

THE Convention of the Congregational Association at Chattanooga adopted resolutions advocating equality among Christians of all colors, and condemning separate churches for whites and blacks. Those who passed these resolutions were white people. The negroes are yet to be heard from.

TALMAGE thinks "the time will come when, instead of going to commercial records to see if a man is A1, people will inquire if he is a professor of religion." This is not probable. That time has been here and gone, for the people found that the most vociferous exhorter was the most dishonest storekeeper. There are people who even question the honesty of Mr. Talmage himself. As is well known, he had his trial.

THE clergy of the country are making a general and promiscuous attack on the divorce laws of the different states, which they claim are productiv of immorality. If the clergy really hav the interest of morality at heart, the best way for them to subserve it is by so conducting themselvs as to no longer deserve the distinction which they now enjoy, of being the most immoral class of men in the country. When ministers let the divorce question alone it will be half solved.

WE learn that Mr. Truesdell has signed a contract with Mr. Lacy for a seance at independent slate-writing. The text of it, however, has not been forwarded to us, but we expect these gentlemen, being reliable, and meaning business, will soon demonstrate either that slate-writing is a fact or a fraud. There is no back down to Mr. Truesdell from the terms of his challenge in a recent TRUTH SEEKER, and Mr. Lacy is equally confident. The conclusion is awaited with interest, as it is expected to be something of interest to the world.

OF Mr. Remsburg and his great Rochester speech, Mr. Walser's Liberal, which has recently been strengthened by the acquisition of Capt. Frank Greene as associate-editor, says:

"We notice by the papers that Mr. John E. Remsburg, a gentleman of marked ability, second to none as a writer or lecturer, with hand and heart in the cause of Liberalism, is now making an extensiv tour throughout the southern states. He is a gentleman deserving of the highest praise, and entitled to the warmest friendship from every one, with a mental horizon broad enough to grasp the necessities of the age. He is a tireless worker, an honor to himself and a credit to humanity. He deserves unqualified support. The publication of his great lecture, entitled 'False Claims,' marks an era in the progress of Liberalism. Nothing has appeared since the publication of Col. Ingersoll's first volume equal to it as propaganda. It is adapted to the wants of to-day. It treats of a subject of which every one knows something, and should be widely circulated among the people. It is historically true, logically true, and must forever stand waiting for an answer. Every Liberal should read it, and persuade others to read it."

J. B. FILLMORE, of Hebron, Conn., a prominent church-member, denounces his pastor, the Rev. J. B. Cutler, Congregationalist, as a hypocrit and a liar. Besides his remarkable piety, Mr. Fillmore has three divorced wives, and it was by allusion to these that the pastor drew upon himself the unfavorable opinion of that gentleman. The Rev. Mr. Roberts, Methodist, of the same place, has incurred the criticism of his congregation by calling them all blockheads. Thus are the religious amenities sustained between pulpit and pew.

MR. ROBERTS, editor of Mind and Matter, has been mulcted by the Tice brothers, of Brooklyn, of $6,000.12, besides costs of court, for a malicious libel published some time ago in his paper. Being unable to pay, he will go, he states, into "enforced retirement" in this city. Just where he will liv he does not say, but the inference is that it will be at some caravansary where the clerk carries a big key and is more particular about who he lets out than who comes in. Probably the Ludlow Street Jail will be his abiding-place until he can effect a settlement of the claims against him. Meanwhile Mind and Matter will be suspended. We know nothing of the merits of the case, but the jury seem to hav been of the opinion that Mr. Roberts was more malicious than the Tice brothers were injured. It is a disgraceful squabble among Spiritualists.

SAM LONG, a Chinaman, was the leader of a Bible class in the Pilgrim's Presbyterian Sunday-school on Madison avenue and 121st street, in this city. He showed signs of becoming an ornament to the Christian community; but he broke into a store last week and absorbed a roll of fine broadcloth, and the court held him for trial. In his pocket was found the following:

"He who hath made thee whole
Will heal thee day by day;
He who hath spoken to thy soul
Hath many things to say."

The court said five hundred dollars bail. Mr. Long was unable to raise the amount, and is in durance. Sam got religion to hav his sins forgiven, and if it fails in this way he don't understand what it is good for.

"MAN and the Other World" was the title of a discourse delivered by Monsignor Capel, in St. Francis Xavier's church, this city, last Sunday evening, before an audience of several thousand persons. Luther, he said, sowed the seed, four centuries ago, of which the harvest is now being reaped. He asserted the principle of private judgment as the last tribunal of appeal. When he so spoke Catholicism was strong in Europe, and it was impossible to see at once the consequences of his doctrin, or where he would land those who followed him. The principle he asserted had brought no conversions from non-belief to belief in Christianity. It had brought men to delay natural religion, and to deny—or practically to deny—revelation. Perhaps true; but it is singular that all Protestantism should turn out in holiday attire to celbrate the birthday of a man who did nothing for the world except to inaugurate modern Infidelity.

BEECHER is working hard to reform Christianity. His idea of what that religion is will not agree with his creed, nor with any orthodox definition, but he puts a great deal of bitter truth into his pulpit lectures. Last Sunday he said:

"That view of religion which makes it a soul-saving business, and which often is put foremost of all, is the meanest view of religion that can be conceived of. A man who spends his whole force in the effort to save his soul has not got much of a soul to save. It is the quintessence of selfishness. The kind of revival preaching that seeks to drive men into heaven through fear of hell is not Christianity. We are to act for ourselvs that we may be strong for others. The gospel of morality exalted is the foundation of the true Christian character. Helping other men is inseparably connected with Christian experience. Often theology has presented God and duty in such forms as to be repulsiv to men. A clear understanding, a pure moral sense, has been bound to reject theology sometimes, and might hav done it oftener. Theologians usually call this repugnance of a man's moral sense to certain teachings an evidence of his enmity to God. Languid Christianity is not worth much. Electricity that won't giv out any light, candles that won't burn, coals that won't illumin nor kindle, what are they good for? What multitudes of Christians there are who say, 'Well, I will hav just as many graces as will keep me going, and I hope to be saved when I die.' I hope they won't. This mean, low, calculating Christianity, this vulgar kind of Christianity, is an abomination."

A CONGREGATIONAL preacher out at Oberlin is sued by a prominent druggist for $30,000 damage for slander. The language on which the action is based, which was uttered in in the pulpit, and which, by the way, is a plagiarism, is as follows:

"The shadows of death are the golden haze which heaven's light makes when it meets the earth and mingles with its shadows. But to thee [meaning the druggist] there shall be shadows full of phantom shapes. Images of terror in the future shall dimly rise and beckon. The ghastly deeds of the past shall stretch out their skinny hands and hush thee. Thou shalt not die unattended. Despair shall seize thee. Agony shall tender to thy parched lips her fiery cup. Remorse shall feel for thy heart and rend it open. Good men shall breathe freer at thy death, and utter thanksgiving when thou art gone. Men shall place thy gravestone as a monument and a testimony that a plague is stayed, and as, borne on the blast, thy guilty spirit whistles toward the gates of hell, the shrieks of those whom thou hast destroyed shall pierce thee—hell's first welcome."

The court is to settle the question whether or not this language is sufficiently damaging to constitute slander. If the spirit of every man who sells liquor is to go whistling toward the gates of hell in the peculiar manner described, it is well enough for the fact to be known. If, however, such is not the case, and if the peace of mind of a prominent and well-meaning druggist is to be destroyed by the false representation of the clergyman, the latter should be promptly sat down upon by the court. The world awaits the result of this remarkable suit with great interest.

The Problem of Final Causes.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: We are having a splendid discussion, and one, to me, charming and instructiv. I hav endeavored to confine myself to argument, and not to pollute your pages with personalities and abuse, and hav been gloriously successful. To me it is an evidence of superior intelligence when two or more thoughtful minds may radically differ upon any subject not yet clearly established by science, and yet regard each other in a kind and fraternal spirit.

My humble effusions, which you were kind enough to present to your readers, hav called out numerous replies and criticisms, not only fully reciprocating my method of studied fairness, but also conferring great honor upon me by the additional luster shed upon the discussion by the able arguments of two of your most charming and learned correspondents.

The controversy now has assumed such magnitude, and covers so many points, that it is impossible at present to review each argument advanced by your fair correspondents, Mrs. Heddon and Mrs. Macdonald, and I will, therefore, confine myself strictly to the main point: Does mind exist prior to and outside of organism or matter, and do the forces of nature producing the organism manifesting intelligence indicate the a priori existence of a "God," of an "infinit conscious soul," or of an infinit number of "atomic minds?"

Mrs. Heddon indignantly renounces the popular belief in a God, but insists that "nature has a conscious soul, which is a constituent part of itself;" while Mrs. Macdonald insists that "matter and mind in conjunction evolve and develop forms of both matter and mind; but matter does not from itself evolve mind, nor mind matter. Their elements always were. They are coeval, and, as Mr. Winter says, 'the evolution of their forms has gone on forever.'"

Now, as it will be apparent that my two reviewers hav widely divergent views upon this subject, it will be necessary to dispose of Mrs. Heddon's "infinit" or "universal conscious soul" pervading all nature in the first place.

When properly analyzed, then, in the crucible of reason, we instantly discover that it is but the Jewish God-idea clothed in a new form, and we may safely aver that it Mrs. Heddon had never heard of the personal-God idea before, this new method of expressing it would also never hav occurred to her.

A soul—any soul, however it may be conceived—implies personality, individuality, outline, form, etc.; but these imply limit, finite and local attributes. An infinit soul—a grand unit—occupying all space, is not thinkable, as an infinit universe of matter occupies all space, leaving no room for aught else—if, by the way, aught else were possible. Mind, intelligence, thought, volition, etc., also imply limitation, concentration, and are necessarily limited in their functions. One conscious mind, however loftily conceived, could not possibly be a ruler or governing power of an illimited universe. If, as my critics affirm, man cannot evolve from unconscious matter, but necessitates a "conscious soul" or creator to create him, then, while this "soul" is busy designing and creating a man, cat, or dog, "he"—or "it"—cannot possibly attend to the creation of innumerable other creatures, here and upon all the other planets also, at one and the same time. "His"—or "its"—mind could not possibly be concentrated upon each and every one of the citizens of New York, and their newly conceived or to-be-conceived offspring also, upon all the other citizens of the United States, upon each tree, flower, and cabbage growing there, and attend to the Hottentot, and Chinese, and their progeny, and floral culture just as well! Not mentioning, alas! the God-less condition of our brethren on other planets, while "he"—or "it"—is thus overworked here! Mrs. Heddon could hardly consider these arguments, and simultaneously listen to the sublime harmonies of a Beethoven, with due appreciation. But if any one would demand of her to solve a profound problem of Euclid, to contemplate the mysteries of the universe, to listen to Langtry, Booth, and Irving, to hear Theodore Thomas's sublime orchestra, to critically examin a hundred or two ancient works of art, to cook an excellent dinner, make a new dress, and write out a reply to this, my argument, and all this at one and the same moment, it would still be child's-play, and a mere bagatelle, in comparison to the vast achievements she complacently insists are done by her one "conscious soul!"

Mind is finite, and any mind omnipresent and omniscient is unthinkable and impossible in nature.

Mrs. Macdonald's idea of the universal coexistence of mind and matter, both in the ultimate atom and in their most ponderous aggregation as mind-particles, overcomes the above objections, and to me is far more plausible; yet, I confess, after the most desperate effort and earnest desire to grasp the idea as reasonable, I utterly fail.

My previous statements concerning my notions of matter and force hav been so variously and wrongly interpreted that I will now presume to define my ideas concerning them (or it, as we shall see) in such a manner that they cannot again be misunderstood.

Naught exists but matter. All substance, all that is, and has a being, all that which can assume form, or shape, or fill space, all that which has existence, properties, attributes, all that which may be the cause of an effect—all that is matter and composed of matter. Naught exists outside of it. All else are but terms we hav given to the innumerable qualities, properties, and phenomena of and evolving from matter. Matter is the only existence per se; all existence matter in the abstract.

Force has no existence apart from matter. It has no existence in itself. The term applies to the various properties or potencies of matter. Some philosophers hav argued—because no particle of matter exists without force—that naught exists but force; that matter is force; and in one sense it is true; but to better convey ideas, and to properly discriminate between matter and its quality or attributes, I think we cannot afford to dispense with the term and eradicate the name of "matter" from our language.

Let us call existence in the abstract, "matter;" every atom a particle of matter, and let us apply the term, "force," to the kind or quality of matter, to its various physical and chemical properties, to its peculiar mode of motion, action, etc. Matter is what it is; force is what it does or is capable of doing.

A woman is a woman—nothing else, abstractly speaking. Size, form, beauty, loveliness, intellectuality, goodness, affection, etc., are her qualities, but hav no existence apart from her material existence.

Beauty, harmony, time, music, etc., are effects or qualities produced by a perfectly organized music-box; but burn up the box, melt the brass and steel, and all these qualities of this identical box are destroyed forever.

Matter, in greater or lesser aggregation, alone remains. Now the question arises, if the various inherent properties of matter, in each individual atom, are or may logically be considered intelligent. It is hard for us to conceive that a drop of water contains millions of intelligent creatures, but when we are told that when each individual animalcule is annihilated as an organism, and again disintegrated into original atoms, these latter, even then—each individually—represent a soul or mind, this, I confess, caps the climax of assumption, and my "bump" of credulity is not prominent enough to cause me to believe it.

I believe it is stated authoritativly that, though millions of infusoria inhabit a drop of water, each animalcule in turn is again composed of millions of atoms. Now, if the atomic—mine—theory were true, would not each animal possess millions of minds, and man countless millions of them?

We exist, and the cause of our origin is the vital question. Now, unless we can trace this cause to the minutest possible form of existence—to the ultimate atom, which is vital force, ever pregnant and potent to create and assimilate greater forms—the problem will never be solved. We must decrease, lessen the existing complexities of the "first cause," not increase them, as the church has done in all time. If you say, "God" creates, we say, Who created "God?" If, with Mrs. Heddon, we say there is a "conscious soul" pervading all nature, this "soul" is ever staring the earnest thinker in the face, and he will never be content until he has discovered what caused this soul, and what it is composed of! If it is true that individual mind, and all it implies, are coexistant with the atom, we are stunned, and exclaim, Is it possible? Can one single particle—a million of which do not make a grain of sand—a unit, inorganic and without parts—think, reason, and plan, and design the creation of a greater being? Does each handful of sand, each pebble, each rock, contain an infinit number of conscious minds, who by volition seek the various forms in which we behold them? Does each germ voluntarily grow into a rose or a thistle? into a golden-winged songster, or a hideous snake? into a beautiful woman, or shocking monstrosity?

Theism, Spiritism, Pantheism, atomic-mind-ism all but aggravate the mystery; Materialism—spontaous, soulless generation alone will explain all!

Peck's Boy Tackles an Infidel

AT THE INSTANCE OF A DEACON.—HE SCOURGES HIM AFTER THE MANNER OF THE PIOUS PEOPLE OF OLD, BUT NOT WITH SUCH EMINENT SUCCESS.

"Hello! hello! hello!" yelled the groceryman to the bad boy, as he peeked through the window from the outside to see if any customers were in. "Come in and let me look at those bruises you are carrying. Great heavens, how did you get that italic style on your nose, and did the same blow blacken both eyes?" and the groceryman laughed at the broke-up condition of the boy.

"Oh, you may laugh if you want to, but when you get walked all over by an Infidel, and hav some teeth knocked down your throat, you won't laugh so much;" and the boy pouted as much as he could with his mouth swelled, and looked at the grocer as though he would like to tip the stove over.

"What about an Infidel? You havn't been fighting with a heathen hav you? Tell me all about it, because you are on your last legs, and confession is good for the soul. Reveal to me the cause of that leaning tower of Pisa nose, and that hic jacet colored eye," and the groceryman winked at a carpenter who came in to fill his tobacco-box.

"Well, you see one of the boys belonging to our gang of widow-helpers, his pa is an Infidel, and he don't believe anything, but he can saw more wood for widows than any of the boys. He is a good fellow, only he does not go to Sunday-school, and don't believe there is any God, or devil, or anything. He has made us boys tired more than six times, when we hav been sawing wood, talking about things that we believed in that he didn't. He said the idea that a whale swallowed Jonah was all bosh, and Elijah going up in a chariot of fire was poppycolic, and everything was wrong. I went to a deacon of our church, a regular old hard-shell, and told him about the boy, and asked him what ought to be done about it, and he was mad at the Infidel boy, and said he ought to be scourged, and we should smite him, and beat him with many stripes. I asked the deacon if it would be right for us good boys to pile on to the Infidel boy, and made him believe things, if we had to choke them down him and he said it would be doing a service to humanity, and would win for us everlasting fame and glory. Well, here's your glory. Gaze on my left-handed nose and you can see the fame. I tell you, I don't take no more jobs converting Infidels. I want to do everything that is right, but hereafter, if an Infidel meets me on the sidewalk, I shall go across the street and let him have the whole street. You see, we got the Infidel boy up in the hay-mow of the barn, and while the boys were talking to him I slipped a clothes-line around his legs and tied them, and then tied his arms, and we had him so tight he couldn't wiggle. He tried to get away, but he couldn't, and then I commenced upon him about Adam and Eve eating the apples. At first he wouldn't believe anything, but I choked him until he admitted that the devil got them into the scrape. Then I asked him if he believed that the Lord cut a spare rib out of Adam and took a lot of dust and puttied it up and made Eve, and set her up in the sun to dry. The darned Infidel kicked on that and said he never would believe it, but I sat down on his stomach and tickled his nose with a straw, and finally he caved, and said he believed it, but he was mad, and tried to chew the clothes-line around his arms to get away, but we held him tight. Then I tackled him on the children of Israel walking through the sea without getting their feet wet or catching cold, and he said that was a blasted lie. I gave him two minutes to believe that, and when the time had expired he said he couldn't swallow it, so I took hold of his ears and tried to pin them together at the back of his head, and finally he weakened and said the story did begin to look reasonable, and he believed it. We were getting along splendidly, and I thought what a triumph it would be to bring that boy into Sunday-school, a firm believer, a brand plucked from the burning. We took a recess, and played mumblety-peg, all except the Infidel, for ten minutes, and then I tackled him on Joshua commanding the sun to stand still, and he said that was all nonsense, that it couldn't be done, and I began to run timothy hay and tickle-grass up his trousers legs, and finally he weakened and admitted that Josh was all right on the sun scheme. He kicked on Solomon having a thousand wives and said he never would believe a man could be such a blasted fool, but I took a hay rake and parted his hair in the middle, and filled the inside of his undershirt with oats, and when they began to hurt him he said the Solomon story was true, and he even went so far as to believe Solomon had twelve hundred wives, so I got him to believe two hundred more than there was, which is pretty good for an Infidel. He wouldn't take any stock in Jonah and the whale, until we buried him up in the hay and made him believe we was going to set the hay on fire, when he said he believed that whales were used in those days to carry passengers, and were fitted up with state-rooms on the inside. Then I tackled him on the Hebrew children being cast into the fiery furnace, and not being scorched at all, but he said he would believe anything but; that so I put on my roller skates and began to walk on him, and skate, and fall down on him, and he begged and said come to think of it, that fiery furnace story looked the most reasonable of the whole lot. Then I thought he was getting to be converted enough for one day, and I untied the rope and let him loose. You wouldn't believe a boy could be so base, but as soon as he was loose, all the good work I had done on him seemed to be lost, and he became an Infidel again in less than a minute, and scared the other boys down stairs with a pitchfork, and cornered me, and knocked me down, and walked on me, and pounded me, and before he got through with me he made me swear that I didn't believe anything in the Bible. He was just as mean as he could be, and I don't dare be good unless I go off somewhere alone. I showed my nose to the deacon, and told him the Infidel mauled me, and the deacon said I was no good. Say, what would you do if you was in my place?"

"I would go and soak my head," said the grocery-man. "You hav got to learn one thing, and that is, mind your own business about your religious views. The Infidel boy is as much entitled to his belief as you are, and the days of choking your views down people who do not believe as you do are passed. After you get mauled a few times more you will be pretty smart. You attend to doing good, wherever you see a chance, but don't try to stem the tide of Infidelity by brute force, and you will be happier."

"All right, that lets me out," said the boy, as he looked in a mirror to see how black his eyes were and tried to push his nose back square in front. "Hereafter people can believe as they please, but I will get even with that deacon, or my name is not Hennery. I bet he knew that Infidel boy was too much for me. Don't it seem strange to you that an Infidel should be endowed with muscle enough to knock a Christian boy silly. I can't account for it. I should think the good boy ought to have the most muscle," and the boy went off thinking how to get even with the deacon.

MR EDITOR: I am sorry you hav had to appeal to me personally, but the fact is I hav been away from home for more than a year, but the folks at home kept taking the paper out of the office, and were glad to. I am now glad to pay up my delinquency and a year in advance. We can't do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed please find $5.10, which enter to my credit. A. W. SWAIN.

BELLEVUE, MICH.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 00 to pay up past dues and leave some for the future.

Drive on your plowshares of thought against the commonly accepted Christian theology of the past hundreds of years, cemented with the blood of ignorance, superstition, and crime. I can see a great change within the last four years. Men are beginning to stop and think—men, too, of the very best quality of mind. JAMES MULOANY.

AUSTIN, MO., Oct. 27, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 50 for a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been a subscriber to the paper some time, and the more I read it the more I like it. It is mental food. I hav learnt at a late day that I hav fooled away the best part of a lifetime by not thinking for myself. I now see the errors, conflictions, improbabilities, and impossibilities in that old book called the holy Bible. that we are asked to accept as divine truths. There are a great many Liberals in this county, but they are not making much noise. Put me down as a lifetime subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

CHAMPAIGN, ILL., NOV. 2, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I start to-day for my old home in Kalamazoo. I went this spring to Springerton, intending to locate there, but superstition has compelled me to migrate, acting on the principle that it were better to run and hav another chance to crack away at the "overgrown boss." Some time since some one sent me a copy of "Revelations of Antichrist," and you sent me "Besant-Hatchard Debate," and it was too much for them to hav a person boldly assert that there was no Christ, as laid down by the theological world. Steps were taken to indict me for blasphemy, and knowing that they had prepared two physicians to swear that I was insane on that subject if I paid my fine, they were then going to send me to an insane asylum, I concluded it were best to run away and fight another day. So I left before the grand jury sat. I don't feel that I hav committed a crime, but I could help to giv the Christians a crush now and then, and knowing I was in the minority, thought it were best to run away rather than be separated from my wife and cast in an insane asylum, simply because I denied the existence of one of the most cruel monsters that ever lived—one who says we must follow him or be damned—one who requires his followers to hate father and mother, wife and loved ones. To perdition with such a savior! I go to Kalamazoo to-day. I love the cause of Freethought, and will aid it to my extent. ARTHUR C. EVERETT.

GURNEE, LAKE COUNTY, ILL., NOV. 1, E.M. 283.

MR. EDITOR: Dear friend, I hav worked early and late, at times when I was able, the last season of pleasant weather, to increase THE TRUTH SEEKER'S patrons, but hav only sent you three, that I think of. I spoke to T. C. Leland to inform you that I would send an order as soon as I had canvassed what I could this fall in this priest-ridden county. You should hav seen, as I did, the "Revs." going from house to house to inform the saints that as the Lord's works were first in order, when Chainey and Watts were here they should giv the Infidels a thin house. Inclosed find post-office order for $3.50—$1 for the monument of D. M. Bennett; the $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the paper that grows better every time "Perry & Co.," speak Selah. Dear sister "Elmina," please study those atomic letters over and over—ten times over; and if you can resist them still, then write something better than "John's Way," and we will forgiv you still until we meet you in that happy land, where we will write our troubles in the sand. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since you published the Spiritualist at Work, for E. V. Wilson. I hav in my library the "Sages," etc., the "Champions," etc., Paine's works, the "Age of Reason," the five volumes of travels by D. M. Bennett, and some smaller works. My pens will not work this morning. so I will quit and mail this.

Yours truly, T. V. LAWSON,
Vice-president of the State League of Illinois.

ADRIAN, Mich., Oct. 27, 283.

MR EDITOR: I hav this day got home from a little visit to Cincinnati, where I made it a point to make our aged Materialistic friend, Thomas Winter, a visit, as I was curious to see the man and to hav a visit with him, seeing some of our more narrow-minded and Spiritualistic friends seem to be so tired with his open and plain way of talking in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I found him to be a man in every sense of the word, though just at this time he was afflicted with a sore gathering on his ankle-joint. He told me he never knew what it was to be under the influence of ardent spirits, neither that of tobacco, with the exception of once, when he was misled by larger boys into smoking some tobacco. But as nature chastised him severely for the infraction of her law he never repeated it. When I came home I found an article over his name in THE TRUTH SEEKER touching his own character, as the opposit of quarrelsome, intolerant, and bigoted, every word of which, in my brief acquaintance with him, I can most heartily indorse; and my advice to his Spiritualistic critics is to turn back to his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 27th, and re-read it. Then go and study nature's law, and learn from her teachings that you are one of her children, and that she givs you no more proof of your individuality after death than she does of your separate individuality before you were born; that conception, birth, growth, maturity, old age, death, and dissolution are her laws with the individual; while the race is eternal, and forever evoluting from a lower to a higher order of being, the strongest always surviving the weaker, and the fittest forever taking the place of the unfittest; and now, as you lay all your selfish nature on the altar of truth, and make yourself a study from an intellectual and rational standpoint, you will find that the argument is all on the side of the evolution of man from a low order of being, and that step by step the race has evoluted from the lower to a higher plane of life. And what other forms of life time may bring to light, time only can tell. In the language of the poet, we would say:

"Something, perhaps as much above
Mankind as man is to the meanest thing that crawls,
May claim dominion o'er the world; in short,
To what may be no limit can be set.
We see the future dimly in the past;
Earth's changes hav been frequent, though but slow;
And with them, and with equal pace, hav changed
Its forms of life; this all will now admit.
The only doubt is, how these changes came."

S. D. MOORE.

WELLAND, ONT., CAN., Oct. 29, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The ten TRUTH SEEKERS are received, and mostly distributed. I find a good many Liberal, half-Liberal, and Liberally disposed people in the country who know but little of the efforts that are being made at the present time to spread the light as revealed by science and good sense, in opposition to those dark and ignorant superstitions so long indulged in, and which most of us hav been brought up and trained to reverence as truth, without (to the thinking mind) any satisfactory evidence of their being so.

I find, even in this country, a more ready disposition in a greater number of people to read Freethought or Liberal literature than was the case a few years ago. I hav received letters from parties to whom I had sent Liberal papers, expressing satisfaction, and a wish to hav more. I consider the circulation of Liberal reading is the best missionary work that can be done in the Liberal cause. Although the prejudice of many in favor of the creed in which they had been trained is difficult to overcome, yet if they can—and they sometimes will, from curiosity—be induced to read matter upon the other side, and although they may not agree with it at once, it will be like seed sown. and is likely, sooner or later, to vegetate or bear fruit.

We cannot blame ourselvs for being what we are, nor hav we a right to blame others for being different from us. We are all what we are by the opportunities we hav had, and the causes which hav led us to adopt this, that, or the other course. The person whose mind has become enlightened upon the true science of life is able to extend a more generous charity toward all than is the Christian churchman who would hav all conform to his creed.

I may say that the sixty cents' worth of tracts you sent, which would weigh five or six ounces, found their way to the custom house. After writing them two letters and sending twenty-five cents I got them, nearly four weeks after leaving your office. I think it was more the work of a certain post-office official than the customs. As they could not confiscate them, they chose to annoy.

Charles Watts gave us a lecture here on Sept. 18th, and we are arranging to hav him speak here again about the middle of November. He had an audience of about six hundred, and we expect as many or more the next lecture.

The church folks are very combativ, but that helps to keep the game alive and brings the question more before the people, and sets some thinking upon the subject who hav seldom, if ever, thought upon it before—who, like all the other religionists of the world, consider theirs the only true one, for the reason that that is the one that they hav from infancy been trained to believe. JOHN RAY.

MONMOUTH, ILL., Oct. 24, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: It may seem rather late to say what ought to hav been said three weeks ago; but a partial neglect on my part, and delay for other reasons, hav prevented my sending the following in relation to the death of one of our brightest and ablest Freethinkers, Mrs. Ella Birge Wilson, who passed from this life on the 1st day of October, 1883.

Mrs. Wilson was a woman of rare ambition, a close student and reader, clear reasoner; and always endeavored to obtain a reason for all things. With her there was no middle ground. She could not accept the dogmas of Christianity, and she could not altogether feel ready to accept the Spiritualistic faith, and with that, she said, "One world at a time, and I will try and do my part to make it better." So she lived, and thus she died; and the world is the better for her living in it.

Shelley says: "Death is a gate of dreams and gloom, that leads to azure fields and brighter skies, and regions of eternal hope."

Why, then, may we not believe that in those azure fields she may be realizing the beginning of a full fruition of the hopes she entertained while here?

The old "Liberal Society," which disbanded about a year ago, was the place where Mrs. Wilson exhibited her talents in the clearest manner; her essays and poems were listened to with profound attention, and when she had anything to say, it was said forcibly and to the point. She was a fine writer, an easy, fluent speaker, and one who, had she lived, would hav ranked still higher in the Freethought literary field of workers. To show the esteem in which she was held, the old members of the Liberal Society met at the residence of Mr. J. A. Chaffee, in Monmouth, and appointed a committee to draft the following resolutions of respect to the departed one:

IN MEMORIAM.

At a meeting of the Liberal Society, held at the residence of J. A. Chaffee, Sunday, October 7, 1883, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, Our beloved sister, Ella Birge Wilson, has departed this life, and left behind a loving husband and two sorrowing orphan children, and aged parents, sister, and relativs; we feel it incumbent upon us, as a society which she so long and faithfully labored to uphold, to testify our high appreciation of her as a woman of high moral and intellectual abilities, and whose place we cannot fill, do bear this testimony:

Resolved, That in the death of Mrs. Ella Birge Wilson, our society has lost its brightest member, the Liberal cause an earnest and able advocate, and one whose future promised great usefulness to the world at large, being endowed with faculties of a high order, which fitted her to take a high position among the writers and thinkers of the age.

Resolved, That we, as a society, deeply sympathize with the bereaved husband and motherless children, in this hour of sorrow, and by our efforts will endeavor to soothe the stricken hearts by words and deeds of heartfelt sympathy.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be presented to the family of the deceased sister. and also furnished for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Boston Investigator, and League Man.

MRS. ARABELL RANDALL
MRS. ANNA WILSON.
SANFORD W. SMITH.
Committee.

Yours truly, S. W. SMITH.

BRONSON, LEVY CO, NOV. 12, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 27th a letter to Mrs. Slenker from Janet Spencer, in which the writer suggests that the money subscribed to place a granit shaft over the last resting-place of the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER be used to build a "Bennett Home for aged Liberals." I heartily indorse that suggestion. I hav no doubt Mr. Bennett would as heartily approve the plan, could he be now interviewed on the subject. Would not such a home be far preferable to the granit shaft, as a memento to that noble man? I am quite sure that a large majority of the Liberals of the country would vote yea on that question.

The Christians take special pains to indoctrinate the young, and provide for the aged in indigent circumstances. Are Liberals less mindful of their obligations to their young and old than these priest ridden devotees to superstition? I, for one, do not believe it, and yet our failure thus far to suitably provide for the wants of these two classes, which are our special wards, has subjected us to invidious comparisons. In furtherance of this move, I will now make a proposition to this effect, viz., I will donate twenty acres of land as a site for a home for aged Liberals, situated in as healthy a section as can be found in the United States. The land I offer is situated one mile from Bronson, the county-seat of Levy county, Florida. Bronson is on the Transit Railroad, thirty-five miles from its southwestern terminus, on the Gulf of Mexico, and has a money-order post-office, telegraph, daily mails, and a weekly paper, called the Levy Enterprise, and is destined, in the near future, to become a business point of no small consequence. The land I offer is high rolling pine-land, with a light, sandy soil, well adapted to vegetables and semi-tropical fruits, prominent among which is the golden orange. The air above and the water beneath are both soft and pure, and, after a continual residence of three years, I unhesitatingly declare that, in my opinion, there is not a more genial climate to be found on this continent. As a still further inducement, I will furnish one thousand orange-trees from my nursery free of charge, to be planted on the "Home," which, if well cared for, will, in a few years, do much toward the support of the institution, and will continue to do so for a century to come. Lumber is cheap, and suitable buildings can be erected at much less cost than in the Northern states. Hoping to hear a general expression from the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER on this important subject, I subscribe myself,

Yours for Freethought, O. RICHARDSON.

BOSTON, Aug. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed herewith please find an essay bearing the caption of "Christianity," intended for publication in your brave-spoken journal.

I trust the sentiments embodied in my contribution may find an echo in many fearless hearts among your readers, who hav cast behind them forever the vile shackles of a degrading creed.

I embrace this opportunity to shake hands with them, one and all, and to bid them, not God, but good-speed, in our united warfare upon the monster superstition, wherever may be his lair.

I would be happy to hear from friend or foe, either publicly, through your columns, or privately, through your care. Faithfully yours, ELLIOTT PRESTON.

EVANSVILLE, Nov. 11, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I hav often wanted to write a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, but my inability has kept me from doing so. I hav been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly a year, and the more I read it the better I like it. I can tell you it has opened my eyes wide, although I was always pretty Liberal in my views, but not so much as now. My religious views coincide with our friend, John Milton Barnes's, in vol. x of THE TRUTH SEEKER, No. 23, page 358. I lik Wakeman, P.ck, Sunderland, and all Liberal writers except the Spiritualists. I don't believe in spirits, for I see too much of the effect the spirits of Rye, Corn, & Co., hav on a great many people of our city.

I think Watts on the "Fall and Redemption," caps the climax. I showed it to several of my orthodox friends, among them the secretary of the Y. M. C. A. I asked him what he thought of it, and he gave their usual answer, "It is very good, but he givs us nothing in the place of religion." It seems as though the orthodox want some place to go to when they die, whether they get it or not. I, for my part, believe they won't. The secretary wrote on the margin of the paper: "What better belief is offered than the Bible givs? This man seems to believe in nothing." So I shall show him friend Barnes's letter, and let him see how we, after throwing off the yoke of superstition, feel. Away with superstition, for it is a bitter foe to humanity. Now, if you see fit to publish this, all right; if not, throw it in the waste basket. I am sorry I cannot write a better letter, but you know we cannot all be masters of the pen. As I am a mechanic, of course my mind is not on composition. Will you please send me a few sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I hav a few Liberal friends I can distribute them to, and might get a subscriber.

Yours for truth, HARRY BENDER.

HAMILTON, Nov. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 to pay for following books. There is, as you are aware, some difficulty in getting Freethought works here, but so far I hav got over twenty copies of Paine's incomparable work, "The Age of Reason." I hav, as you see, had them sent to different addresses, all of them being those of Freethinkers.

Mr. Watts will lecture here on Sunday (to-morrow) twice, whilst Mr. George Chainey unfolds our banner in Toronto, and on Monday and Tuesday Mr. Watts discusses with a Mr. Brookman, a sky-pilot in Toronto.

Freethought is booming here, everybody talking of Agnosticism and of Watts's visit. The Freethinkers here would like to form an alliance with other cities and towns to keep our champion in Canada, as he has expressed a wish to settle on this side of the Atlantic, and there is a grand field in Canada. The harvest is ripe and only waits the reaper.

The ministerial association here hav decided not to recognize Mr. Watts's challenge, on the ground (as they say) that it advertises him and causes the people to flock to hear him. There has been ranting and raving and gnashing of teeth by the clergy since he was here two months ago, when he floored their big gun, Dr. Barns, in a ten-minute speech, in reply to one of the doctor's of an hour and a quarter. Our friends are getting bolder, and are beginning to speak out their doubts; and what a change has come over this community in the last few months! A short twelve-months ago, the Methodists laid, with a great flourish of theological rant, the corner-stone of a church in the suburbs of this city, when one of the speakers told the audience about Chaplain McCabe's telegram to the Freethinkers at Watkins Glen; but he never told them the reply T. B. Wakeman sent him back—they were to continue to build, but build better, and pay their taxes on them, as they would all be wanted in the near future in the cause of humanity. Well, the edifice has lately been completed, and on the occasion of the opening, the building not being half filled, there was a look of intense disappointment on the faces of the pastor and those immediately interested; they having saddled themselvs with the cost of construction, while another Methodist conventicle has a $11,000 mortgage on it, and it expects to come under the auctioneer's hammer, as with an attendance of from fifty to one hundred and fifty each Sunday, they can not pay their pastor's salary, without ever thinking of the debt.

Please don't forget my hint about address. With best wishes, and my pledge to extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

I remain yours, etc, GEO. MADDOCKS.

EATON, D. T., Nov. 5, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: In one of the quarter sections of public land not far from the Dakota river stands a small sod-house; a window 18x24 faces the east, another one the west, and a pane of glass in the door on the south side givs admittance to the sunbeams from that direction. Dull and dismal, like the winter garb of the prairie around it, is the appearance of the little house from without, but not so from within. Here the thick walls are covered with building and news papers, and ornamented with railroad maps, bright pictures of fruits and flowers from seed catalogs, almanacs, New Year's cards, and numerous photographs of friends, among which are those of D. M. Bennett, Col. Ingersoll, E. H. Heywood and family, and others. But the best ornament of the sod-house is the book-shelf, holding the productions of brains like those of Paine, Bennett, Proudhon, Fourier, Darwin, Emerson, Whitman, and others. Among the Liberal papers that come to us in the solitude we highly welcome THE TRUTH SEEKER. Though not entirely familiar with the English language, I delight in the reading of the instructiv and interesting articles the excellent paper brings. How often do I wish to shake hands with the personally unknown friends who in its columns bravely stand up for their convictions, and still more for the Agnostics who humbly leave the door open for new truths to enter. One who does not seem to belong altogether to this class says in No. 40 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, addressing Mrs. Heddon: "But alas! you are a woman!" All the answer Mr. Wettstein deserves would be, "Alas! you are but a man." Sometimes people get more than they deserve, and so did he. Though not in need of a gold watch and chain (I prefer a Webster's Unabridged and a good encyclopedia), I should like to draw Mr. Wettstein's attention to one point: does he not see that the cowardly, brute-force doctrin of the fall of man through the woman's weakness is concentrated in those contemptible words of his? Is it not the old, self-idolizing God-dogma of the Bible repeated as haughtily as it ever was? And he who preaches it calls Christians worshiping St. Mary bigots, and the ancients who had a goddess of wisdom, idolaters. Consistency, thou art a jewel!

There, too, is the personification of dying Materialism, Thomas Winter, who announces to "madam" the great truth that none can breathe without lungs. Oh, sancta implicita! Many of the highest attributes of human nature are represented by female figures—charity and love, justice and beauty, and even truth. This may be the reason why women cannot see truth as it is, for usually we do not know ourselvs well; only some men know it all, of course. It is a great pity that for their existence they depend on woman. Had nature endowed some of them with the capacity of reproducing their own admirable self independent of the poor and weaker-minded sex, what wonderful specimens of brain power we might hav! But alas! the woman! And well may it be said, Alas, a woman! There lies a world of woe in these few words—a meaning which even the wisest of men will never be able to conceive.

Friend Chapman's view concerning the effect of arguments on bigots of different hues is sadly correct. I hav never seen any so-called materialized spirits, but I often witness the presence of the spirit of infallibility and intolerance through the channel of human organizations. And what in the name of common sense hav God and religion to do with Spiritualism? About as much, or as little, as with Materialism. The ignorance of this fact on the part of some opponents of Spiritualism proves how little they investigate the philosophy. A single copy of Mind and Matter would show them the true Spiritualists' standpoint on that question. If some still cling to old superstitions, we need not blame Spiritualism for it any more than we would call it the fault of Liberalism that some of its would-be followers can grasp it only in part. Spiritualism, and Materialism, and all other isms, are but as many different avenues finally leading to the temple of truth, for which we are all bound. Those who congratulate themselvs for being on the straightest road to it need not pity others who happen to travel on zig-zag ways, for in their hidden nooks and resting-places are often found sweet blossoms of knowledge gladdening the wanderer's soul.

In No. 41, page 645, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I read, as quoted from Newton's "Principia," "I wish we would derive the rest of the phenomena of nature by the same kind of reasoning from mathematical principles." Then the remark, "What would Newton hav thought about this desire of his being fulfilled if he had lived until Mr. Andrews discovered Universology, which is understood to derive all the phenomena of nature by the same mathematical principles which he applied to a few?" Has Newton's desire not been partly fulfilled by the works of Fourier, of whom Mr. Andrews, in his introduction to J. Warren's "True Civilization" (the gospel par excellence of social reform), says: "His masterly analysis of the human passions is an invaluable contribution to man's knowledge of himself. His daring but shadowy outline of a science of universal analogy, which would be entitled, if once put fairly upon the firm basis of a known science, to the denomination of 'Science of Sciences,' is eminently worthy of estimation," etc. Had I the means, I should be happy to procure some of Mr. Andrews's works, in order to get acquainted with his grand ideas; but the golden northwest has not shown me its much-praised color yet. Yours in the search of truth,

MRS. M. M. EGLI.

LEAVENWORTH, KAS., Nov. 8, 283.

MR. EDITOR: As my life is one of toil, and my associates are generally of the believe-or-be-damned crew, the weekly visits of THE TRUTH SEEKER are highly appreciated. 'Tis my kindred spirit. That of November 3d is just splendid, although some of its contents hav been repeated so often that I think they are becoming monotonous. I allude to the Materialistic and Spiritualistic discussion. A kind of "don't, so it don't," and "does, so it does" argument—which, though natural enough for children, is hardly pardonable in grown people, especially Liberals—seems to be the prevailing one. As for the Spiritualists, I hav no doubt that many of them are laboring under a delusion. Whether or not death ends all is more than I can say. But if it does, this life is a failure with most of us. It costs more than it is worth to mankind generally. Although I am not a Spiritualist, and hav never seen or heard a spirit, that I know of, yet I cannot say there are none.

There are things I cannot see or comprehend that are nevertheless true. I am sure that many good, honest men and women, as truthful and smart as the commonalty of people are, claim to hav both seen, heard, and felt spirits; and why should I doubt their veracity in that more than in other matters? I can see no motiv they can hav in trying to deceive me. Bro. Winter and several others seem to think Spiritualists ignorant, deluded creatures, real objects of pity, but fail to giv good reasons for this belief, proofs of their assertion. Mr. Winter, in his "few words in reply to E. A. Chapman," makes some very bold remarks concerning the poor, ignorant Spiritualists, and places his (the Materialistic) wisdom in contrast to their ignorance, to show how "thin" it is. Seldom do men as smart as Bro. Winter love so well to boast of their wisdom. But we hope Spiritualists hav enough sense left to not notice it, but do as the man did when the mule kicked him.

So far, Mr. Winter's overwhelming argument has amounted to about this, "Death ends all, so it does so it does; now then!" Which is rather "too thin" to be accepted as proof.

Neither hav I seen any proof on the other side. Still, it ill becomes us to dub all such as Samuel Watson, Giles B. Stebbins, D. M. Bennett, Mr. Francis Green, Mrs. Severance, Mrs. Fox, J. M. Peebles, John Pierpont, Slade, Davis, and a host of others, as fools or knaves.

For possibly we ourselvs may be mistaken. The boundary lines of our ignorance may not be the limit of all knowledge. Would it not be far better for us, as Liberalists, to stop throwing mud at each other, and unite our forces to combat our common enemy and that of the whole human family, the church, and do the best we can with the hereafter, if there is any, when we get there?

Fraternally yours, H. H. HUTCHESON.

WINFIELD, Mo., Nov. 7, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $6.50, for which you will please send me Mr. Bennett's last work, "A Truth Seeker Around the World." And please don't get uneasy about my subscription. As soon as I close up my fall work I will pay up and renew for another year. I can't do without THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours respectfully, JOHN D. COX.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

A Bumble-Bee's Thanksgiving.

Mr. Bartholomew Bee was an oldish man, very fat, very bald, and very queer. Just now he was in a state of great excitement. His face was red, and he was striding across the room, kicking over the chairs, clapping his hands, and talking to himself at a great rate.

"I'm an old bumble-bee—that's what I am, or else I'm a fool! No, I'm not a fool; I know better than that; but I'm a blunder-head—a bumble-bee—as I said before. But how the dickens did I know what the reason was she didn't come up after my washing? How could I know, being nothing but a buzzing bumble-bee?"

The fact was that Mr. Bee's washerwoman had not called for his washing for three weeks, and, in a great passion, he had that morning, which was Thanksgiving Day, been to see what was the reason of her neglect. And when he entered her rickety old tenement he was struck speechless at the sight that met his eyes. The poor woman was stretched upon a miserable bed of straw, sick with rheumatism. There was a sickly fire in a miserably rusty stove, around which hovered three little red-headed girls, and a red-headed boy, trying to warm their pinched little fingers. There was no carpet on the floor, and no paint or paper on the walls. The children were scantily clad and barefooted.

As Mr. Bee took in the scene, he blew his nose.

"What is your name?" he asked of the oldest and largest girl.

"Molly."

"And yours?" of the next one.

"Kitty," she answered softly.

"And my name ith Eva," lisped the youngest.

"Boy, what is your name?"

"Tommy, thir."

Mr. Bee had asked these questions in order to gain a little time to collect his thoughts.

"Well, well, Mrs. Magee—ahem! ahem!" and he cleared his throat a dozen times or so. "This is a pretty how-d'ye-do, I must say! Can't ye sit up?"

"I wish I could, sir; indeed, I do," and the big tears rolled down her cheek, so pale and thin.

"There, there, there! Don't snivel. I can't bear that;" and Mr. Bee buzzed around the room, and looked into a little bed-room, whose only furniture was a heap of rags and a three-legged stool.

"Who sleeps in here?" he inquired.

"We children," said Molly, "except Sammy and Evy, who sleep with mamma."

"But where's the bedstead?" he asked.

"We had to burn it to make a fire," said Kitty, hiding behind Molly.

"Oho!" And then Mr. Bee marched into the pantry, and found two or three old plates, as many cracked tea-cups, a spoon or two, and two frozen potatoes.

"What do you liv on here—faith?"

"We havn't any faith, sir—only potatoes."

"Um! havn't any faith, hey? I don't wonder one bit;" and with that, out he went, leaving the children wondering if faith was something good to eat, or what it was.

Going home he walked about the room in the state of excitement above described.

Then he went to the telephone, and ordered half a ton of coal to be sent to the Widow Magee without delay, and he added, "Charge the same to me. B. Bee."

Then he called to his housekeeper, for he was a childless widower these many years. "Elizabeth!"

"Sir!" answered that lady, appearing at the door.

"It is Thanksgiving Day, isn't it?"

"It is, sir."

"Hum! Go down there to the Widow Magee's, where they freeze, and starve, and die with rheumatism, and then, maybe, you'll feel like giving thanks. Pshaw! Elizabeth!"—and Mr. Bee spoke very loud.

"Yes, sir!"

"There's a deal of sham in this world, and meanness, and coldness, and people starving and dying right under our very noses. There's suffering, Elizabeth, and pain, and sorrow, and sin, and shame; and, in the midst of it all, we hav a day of thanksgiving! Pah! Pshaw! Fudge! I say!"

"What should it be, sir?" and Elizabeth looked at Mr. Bee fixedly.

"Why, it might be a day of hope-giving, joy-giving, peace and help-giving; a day of love-giving, money-giving. I say, Elizabeth!"

"Sir?"

"I dine out to-day."

"Why, sir, the turkey is almost done."

"So much the better. When it is done brown, see that it is carried over to the Widow Magee's. I dine with them to-day."

"Why, Mr. Bee! Aren't they awful poor?"

"What of that? Hav that turkey and all the 'fixin's' carried to Mrs. Magee's, I say; table-cloth, table, dishes, everything needful, and when ready to start let me know. I dine with them to-day."

"I don't dine with the likes o' them, though," and Elizabeth's face grew red with rage.

"As you please, madam."

"I giv my notice to quit, sir."

"All right."

Very angry was Elizabeth, as she prepared to do as her employer bade. Blinkins, the hired man, had to harness up the team when the turkey was done, and away they went to the Widow Magee's. Arriving there, Elizabeth was obliged to "set the table." The children were making a meal off the two frozen potatoes, but the coal had come, and they had made a good fire, and had swept the floor.

It is wonderful what a comforter a nice, warm fire is. The squalid room seemed to become cheerful all at once, as the tea-kettle steamed and hissed, and Mrs. Magee made a great effort, and sat up in the rocking-chair that Mr. Bee sent.

What a happy party it was that gathered around the table then—Mr. Bee at the head, and Mrs. Magee opposit, and the ragged little ones ranged around according to their ages, little Sammy next to his mother, and Elizabeth, who had recovered her good nature, and Blinkins waiting upon the company.

Mrs. Magee ate a little of the white meat, and smiled while she wept tears of real thanks and true happiness.

"Lord! how those young ones do eat!" said Blinkins to Elizabeth, in an undertone. "Shouldn't think they'd seen any solid food for a month."

"I wouldn't cook for the likes of 'em," whispered Elizabeth. "They'd eat anybody out of house and home in a fortnight."

"Yes, they'd breed a famin sure," said Blinkins. "See that Sammy!"

Sammy's face was smeared with cranberry sauce, and, with the wing of the turkey in one hand and a "drum-stick" in the other, he was in high glee.

Molly, Kitty, and Eva ate and ate, and said little, while Mr. Bee carved and piled up their plates again and again.

"Lauk!" said Blinkins; "they'll kill themselvs—see if they don't; and then we'll hav to bury the whole lot."

"There won't be any left for us," said Elizabeth, aside, to Blinkins.

"The turkey weighed fourteen pounds," said Mr. Bee, who had caught what she said. "There ought to be enough to go round. And there's the whole under-side isn't touched yet."

Here little Sammy slipped out of his chair, and rolled on the floor.

"Has he bu'sted?" said Blinkins, in some apparent alarm. "I thought he would."

But Sammy clambered back in time for the plum pudding and pumpkin pie.

How they did eat, to be sure!—until they gasped for breath. And how their cheeks filled out, and how their eyes shone!

"Are you all full?" inquired Mr. Bee, as, one by one, they rolled away from the table.

"My clothes are too tight," said Kitty, lifting her arms.

"And mine aren't so loose as they were," said Molly.

Eva said nothing, but crept away to the heap they called a bed, and in ten minutes was fast asleep.

"It must be the first square meal they ever had in all their lives," said Blinkins.

"I never saw anybody eat so—never, in all my born days," said Elizabeth. "I declare I was scared."

When she and Blinkins had eaten their dinner, there was little left of the fourteen-pound turkey but bones.

"I expect they'll all split open to-night," said Blinkins, "like so many peas," as he and Elizabeth cleared up the table.

"No danger; children can stand stuffing as well, or better, than turkeys." And Elizabeth bustled about and converted Mrs. Magee's bed into a respectable-appearing resting-place.

Mrs. Magee said very little indeed, for she was still very weak; but when Mr. Bee was about to leave, she grasped his hand and said:

"Words are too poor to thank you for so much kindness to me and my little ones. You are—"

"No such thing! No, I am not."

"So good and kind—"

"Nothing of the sort, madam; I'm no better than I should be—not a bit. I'm only a great, big bumble-bee; that's what I am—ain't I, Molly?" And Mr. Bee patted Molly's red head.

"I think you are a—a—"

"What, child, what?"

"A—honey-bee, if you please, sir."

"Hear that, will you, Blinkins! I'm a honey-bee, she says. And why am I a honey-bee?"

"Because—because—you brought that honey-comb;" and Molly pointed to the dish of delicious honey-comb that had come along with the "fixin's." "And all the other good things," she added.

"I'm not a honey-bee, though," said Mr. Bee. "I'm a bumble-bee, I tell you, and this is a bumble-bee's thanksgiving—it is!"

Elizabeth reconsidered her determination to leave, and she staid with Mr. Bee until she married Blinkins, and they went away to liv in a home of their own. But Mrs. Magee then came to keep house for Mr. Bee, and a very good housekeeper she was, too. The children were grown up and able to work, but Mr. Bee always had them come to his house to spend Thanksgiving, and a merry time they always had, especially as they referred to the Thanksgiving of the past, which "came in so darkly," as Molly observed on one occasion, "and ended in such brightness."

"And it was all owing to you, Mr. Bee," said Eva, now a fine girl of twelve years.

"I suppose so," said that gentleman. "It was a pretty fair thanksgiving for a bumble-bee to bring about, wasn't it?"

"But you are not a bumble-bee," insisted Eva.

"What is a bumble-bee, then?" asked Mr. Bee.

"Why, it is a very large, big bee," answered Eva, laughing.

"And am I not very large and big, I should like to know? And isn't my name Bee? And hence am I not in truth a bumble-bee? Buzz, buzz, buzz-z-z-zee! And I may say I am a very happy bee, at that, ever since I buzzed into the retreat of one Widow Magee, and found some babies there, freezing and starving to death. Do you know how to make a happy Thanksgiving, Kitty, my girl?" he asked, suddenly.

"It is by making somebody else happy, I suppose," she answered.

Poetry.

Thanksgiving Day.

BY ALHAZA.

thank thee, father, for the hues of autumn's evening sky,
When the rich and balmy breezes from the west come wandering by,
When her shroud of gold and purple the dying season weaves,
And scatters o'er our daily paths her bright, decaying leaves.
For the mellow notes of mourning that the autumn wind-harp flings,
For the beauty thou hast cast around all frail, departing things.

And still they cluster 'round me, these fading, southern flowers;
They linger 'round my pathway, as in brighter, happier hours,
They cheer the bed of sickness with a sweet, reviving smell,
And whisper to the sufferer of those who love him well.
In this world of sin and sorrow, like angels from above,
They only speak of purity, and innocence, and love.

I thank thee that the jails are full, that death is on the tramp,
And should Diogenes appear, and bring his Grecian lamp,
He might find men that cherish truth, and Liberal thinkers, too,
But not within a temple rich, or thousand-dollar pew.
Then let our cheerful spirits fling all slavish thoughts away,
And freely breathe the air of heaven on each Thanksgiving Day.

Help Spread the Light.

It is acknowledged by all that the best way to spread Liberal principles is by papers, tracts, and books. Every issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good missionary document, and every Freethought book sold is a silent pleader and propagator of the truth. There are thousands of Freethinkers all over the country whom we do not know and who do not know this paper. But our friends know them, and we ask such as are willing to spend a few moments for the good of Liberalism to send us their names and addresses, that we may mail them copies of the paper. We are willing to furnish the copies necessary for this purpose and mail them, as we hope a few extra subscribers may thereby be obtained, which will make the pecuniary outlay square. But the main object is to spread the knowledge of Liberalism, its aims and objects, what we think and why we think it. We would like every one to know that the Christian faith is a rope of sand, that the churches are taking the money of the people without giving any return. It is the duty of all Freethinkers to let their neighbors know that the fires of hell hav been quenched.

Many Liberals say they hav no time to devote to missionary work, and do not like to argue with their church acquaintances. Very well, send us the names and let THE TRUTH SEEKER argue the case. Where a man is liberally inclined—and not dead to all sense and reason—we hope and think THE TRUTH SEEKER will bring him clear out of the fog.

To stimulate our friends in this work we make the following offer, only asking that when the sender has read the pamphlets he shall hand them around, that others may be benefited.

To everyone sending us the names and addresses of twenty-five independent men and women who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who do their own thinking, we will send one copy of either of the below-named twenty-five-cent books:

"Influence of Christianity upon Civilization," by B. F. Underwood.

"Advancement of Science." The Inaugural Address of Prof. John Tyndall, delivered before the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

"Chronicles of Simon Christianus." His manifold and wonderful adventures in the Land of Cosmos. A new scripture (evidently inspired) discovered by I. N. Fidel.

"Religion not History." An able examination of the Morals and Theology of the New Testament. By Prof. F. W. Newman, of the London University.

"The Besant-Hatchard Debate." A two nights' debate between Mrs. Annie Besant and Rev. A. Hatchard, on "Jesus of Nazareth a Historical Character, and the Influence of Christianity on the World."

"The Clergyman's Victims." A Radical story vividly portraying the wrongs committed by the professed men of God. By Mrs. J. E. Ball.

"Ecce Diabolus; or, The Worship of Yahweh, or Jehovah," shown to be the worship of the devil.

"Gottlieb: His Life." A romance of Earth, Heaven, and Hell. Beautifully written by S. P. Putnam.

"Jesus Christ." His Life, Miracles, Deity, Teachings, and Imperfections. By W. S. Bell.

"Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier," a curate of a Roman church in France, containing the best of his writings.

"Sepher Toldoth Jeshu; or, The Book of the Generation of Jesus." First translation into English of a remarkable Hebrew document, giving the original from which the story of Jesus was made up.

To those who do not know twenty-five persons whom a perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER would be likely to benefit, but who can send a list of ten names, we will send either of the following, by D. M. Bennett:

"Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind."
"The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers."
"The Gods of Superstition."
"The Great Religions of the World."
"Jesus Christ," considered as an Infidel.
"An Hour With the Devil."
"Sinful Saints and Sensual Shepherds."
"Honest Questions and Honest Answers."

Or either of the following, by Underwood:

"What Liberalism Offers in Place of Christianity."
"Scientific Materialism: Its Meaning and Tendency."
"Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint."
"Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer."
"Woman: Her Past and Present: Her Rights and Wrongs."
"Materialism and Crime."
"Will the Coming Man Worship God?"
"Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity."

This is a chance to enlighten a large body of people, to help THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to get good books to circulate by only a few moments' work. We hope the responses will be many.

Food for Freethinkers.

The lower portion of the opera house was well filled on the evening of the 9th by an audience noticeable for its intelligence and fine appearance. It was made up of persons belonging to divers religious denominations, those who felt no great interest in religion, and those who were avowed opponents of all theological teachings—the latter, judging from their applause of an especially severe attack on Christianity, being in a marked minority. It was a very attentiv, critical audience, and though not very demonstrativ in the way of applause, showed its appreciation by the earnestness displayed on every side. Since Ingersoll was here the public hav had very little of the pabulum served up by this class of thinkers, and the novelty of the discussion and the names of the speakers were no doubt the principal drawing cards.

The meeting was opened by the election of R. B. Stone to the chair. Upon the platform were a number of Freethinkers. The first speaker of the evening was Mr. Charles Watts, of London, who chose for his subject, "Theology and Superstition." In appearance he is a sturdy Englishman, with a large head framed in curly black hair, a broad and intelligent countenance, flanked by side-whiskers, and a well-proportioned figure. He has a taking manner, is an orator in every sense of the much-abused word, and does not make himself offensiv to those of different belief, as he relieves his sharper strictures by a jocular tone. His effort consisted of a denunciation of theology because of its alleged uselessness and the positiv harm it inflicted on the human race. Many of his arguments were familiar to those who hav read or heard the lectures of Freethinkers, but they were presented in an attractiv dress, and had a marked weight with the audience. He is more eloquent than Ingersoll, but has not the latter's magnetism.

He was followed by Mr. George Chainey, a smooth-faced, long-haired, clerical-looking gentleman, who favored a calm and argumentativ style of speaking, and made a heavy onslaught on the clergy as a body. He attempted to show that the world would be a good deal better off without this class, who were a relic of the dark and bloody ages, when science and progress were under the ban of religion. Science had advanced in spite of the maledictions of the clergy, and the world had grown better despite their efforts. It was a priest-ridden land, but truth was certain to prevail in the end.—Bradford (Pa.) Era, Nov. 10, 1883.

HEALTH HINTS TO WOMEN

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR ALL.

THE DANISH CURE EXPLAINED

BY WILHELMINE D. SCHOTT,

Practitioner of the Danish Cure.

WITH PORTRAIT OF AUTHOR.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

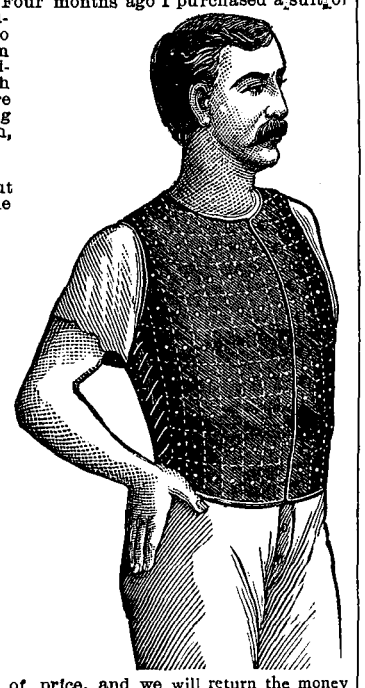
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

The Labarum of Constantine.

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders; and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

THE RADICAL PULPIT.

Comprising discourses of advanced thought by two of America's clearest thinkers.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM and FELIX ADLER

Price, in cloth, $1

Gems of Thought.

IT is a brave and good man who pursues the right course and who performs his duty faithfully, because of the superiority of good actions over evil actions, and he is cowardly and contemptible who only does the right that he may escape punishment. Do good because it is right, and shun evil because it is wrong. —D. M. Bennett.

EVERY day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated; whence it is that old Jacob numbers his life by days; and Moses desires to be taught this point of holy arithmetic, to number not his years, but his days. Those, therefore, that dare lose a day are dangerously prodigal; those that dare mis-spend it, desperate.—Bishop Hall (1574–1656).

THE greater part of mankind are naturally apt to be affirmativ and dogmatical in their opinions; and while they see objects only on one side, and hav no idea of any counterpoising argument, they throw themselvs precipitately into the principles to which they are inclined; nor hav they any indulgence for those who entertain opposit sentiments. To hesitate or balance perplexes their understanding, checks their passion, and suspends their action. They are, therefore, impatient, till they escape from a state which to them is uneasy; and they think that they can never remove themselvs far enough from it by the violence of their affirmation, and obstinacy of their belief.—Hume's Essays.

AND he spake a parable unto them to this end, that men ought always to pray and not to faint; saying there was in a city a judge, which feared not God, neither regarded man, etc.—Luke xviii, 1–8. The psalmists were never weary of exalting the extraordinary might and majesty of Jehovah, mingling petitions with panegyric; and a large portion of the worship of Christians consists in expressions of pious admiration at the extraordinary goodness of their God, especially for his redemption of the world which he himself had condemned. All these extravagant eulogies betray a latent impression that the deity is, after all, a very arbitrary personage, and may be moved to more merciful conduct than he would otherwise pursue by large doses of flattery.—Amberly's Analysis.

WHEN frae my mother's womb I fell,
Thou might hae plunged me into hell,
To gnash my gums, to weep and wail,
In burning lake,
Where damned devils roar and yell,
Chained to a stake.

Yet I am here, a chosen sample,
To show thy grace is great and ample;
I'm here a pillar in thy temple,
Strong as a rock,
A guide, a buckler, an example
To a' thy flock.
—Burns's Holy Willie's Prayer.

IN no wise speak against the truth; but be abashed of the error of thine ignorance.—Eccl. iv, 25.

EVEN in what people do for pleasure, conformity is the first thing thought of; they like in crowds; they exercise choice only among things commonly done; peculiarity of taste, eccentricity of conduct are shunned equally with crimes, until, by dint of not following their own nature, they hav no nature to follow; their human capacities are withered and starved; they become incapable of any strong wishes or nativ pleasures, and are generally without either opinions or feelings of home growth, or properly their own. Now is this, or is it not, the desirable condition of human nature?—Mill's Liberty.

THERE is no one quality that givs so much dignity to a character as consistency of conduct. Even if a man's pursuits be wrong and unjustifiable, yet if they are prosecuted with steadiness and vigor we cannot withhold our admiration. The most characteristic work of a great mind is to choose some one important object, and pursue it through life. It was this that made Cæsar a great man. His object was ambition; he pursued it steadily, and was always ready to sacrifice to it every interfering passion or inclination.—Mrs. Barbauld's Inconsistency in Our Expectations.

NOTHING, at first view, may seem more unbounded than the thought of man, which not only escapes all human power and authority, but is not even restrained within the limits of nature and reality. To form monsters and join incongruous shapes and appearances, costs the imagination no more trouble than to conceive the most natural and familiar objects. And while the body is confined to one planet, along which it creeps with pain and difficulty, the thought can in an instant transport us into the most distant regions of the universe, or even beyond the universe, into the unbounded chaos, where nature is supposed to lie in total confusion. What never was seen or heard of may yet be conceived; nor is anything beyond the power of thought, except what implies an absolute contradiction.—Hume's Essays.

THE lunatic, the lover, and the poet,
Are of imagination all compact;
One sees more devils than vast hell can hold—
That is the madman; the lover, all as frantic,
Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt;
The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and givs to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.
—Shakspere's Midsummer Night's Dream.

NOTHING is rich but the inexhaustible wealth of nature. She shows us only surfaces, but she is million fathoms deep. That which benefits us, embosomed in wonder and beauty as we are, is cheerfulness and courage, and the endeavor to realize our aspirations. Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that, unsuspected, ripens within the flower of the pleasure that concealed it.—Emerson.

ONE of the mistakes in the conduct of life is to suppose that other men's opinions are to make us happy.—Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy.

Odds and Ends.

"A NEW pair of pandyloons," says Carl Pretzel, "may cofer de lecks of a fool, but ven his mout vas go open, der fool shumps oud."

A SIGN in the shop window: "Boy Wanted." Young wife to her husband: "My dear, isn't that too bad? I suppose they hav all girls."

PROFANITY may not be a characteristic of the royal family, but some breezy day you ought to go out into the kitchen and hear the queensware.

AN old lady down in Maine says her daughter has just bought an elegant "cabin organ," and she thinks the "nux vomica" stop is just lovely.

WHEN lovely woman's feet are sevens,
And such a size her soul abhors,
What does she then? Why, gracious heavens!
She squeezes them in No. fours.

THERE are no nice little stories about the return of "The Prodigal Daughter." The son can return and hav the finest veal served up for him, but the daughter must stay away.

"HOW is Johnnie doing at school?" asked a lady of Johnnie's mamma during a call. "Splendidly. He talks in two languages now." "Dear me! What are they—French or German?" "Oh, no. English and profane."

A MORMON, son of an apostle, has skipped with the funds of a savings bank. When it comes to handling poor people's money the Latter-Day Saints appear to be no better than the psalm-singing gentiles who hav robbed banks in all cities.

"I HAS heard folks say," said Uncle Mose, "dat dey could tell a smart man by lookin' in his eye, but dis am a mistake. De mole ain't got no eye to speak ob, but dinged if he ain't got more sense den de toad w'at ken look at you ten minutes widout winkin'."

A FRAGMENT of conversation between young girls: "Do you know what a preface is?" "No; do you?" "Not exactly; only I know it is at the beginning of books." "Oh, well; then it must be the same as when we are courted before entering on marriage."

A COMMERCIAL traveler, having left a shirt at an inn, wrote to the chambermaid to send it on to him, and she sent the following:

"I hope, dear sir, you'll not feel hurt;
I'll frankly tell you all about it.
I've made a shift of your old shirt,
And you must make a shift without it."

A YOUNG man approached a gentleman in Chicago, mistaking him for a minister with whom he was slightly acquainted. "Mr. Bee," he said, "I expect to be married in a few days, and I shall require your services." The gentleman addressed, who happened to be a lawyer, replied: "You hav evidently mistaken me for some one else; but it is perhaps a fortunate mistake after all. Allow me, sir," and he handed the young man his card, which bore the legend, "Divorces obtained without publicity."

"SO you want a position, do you, young man? What can you do?" "I am willing to make myself useful in any capacity." "Do you drink?" "No, sir." "Smoke?" "No, sir." "Gamble?" "No, sir." "Go to church and Sunday-school?" "Always, sir." "Swear?" "Oh, no, sir." "Got any recommendations?" "Nothing but this, sir," and with considerable emotion he laid a well-thumbed Testament on the desk. A look of disgust swept over the proprietor's face as he remarked, "I thought so. You won't do. We've had that dodge played on us before."

THE presence of John Slugger Sullivan in town last Sunday had its effect even on the minds of the children, as is attested by the following: A gentleman was talking to the Sunday-school scholars of the Presbyterian church, and he asked who Solomon was, and there was no answer. "Who was Solomon, children?" he repeated. A hand popped up over in the corner. "Well, my boy, tell us who Solomon was." "He's the boss slugger, an' he knocks 'em all out in four rounds; but mamma said papa shouldn't go to see him, 'cause he didn't slug on a week-day."

"BRUDDER MOSES, as you is pastor ob our church, I t'inks you might use your 'fluence to git me a divorce from dat wicked man ob mine," and the good sister of the colored church wiped something from her eyes with her apron. "Can't do it, sister; can't do it. 'W'at God has jined togedder let no man put asunder.' Doan yer forgit dat." "But God didn't jine us togedder, Brudder Moses. We was married by de 'squire." "An' w'at did yer pay de 'squire to marry yer?" "Two dollars, an' Alexander put in a hundred bushels ob coal for de 'squire to pay it." "Well, den, gib me two dollars cash in advance—w'at it cost yer to git married—an' I use my 'fluence to git yer unmarried ag'in. Remember dat w'at dat kind ob man hab put togedder God ken put asunder—but de cash down is de necessary 'quivalent, an' doan yer forgit it."

DEPUTY MARSHAL RACER had quite an exciting trip in Sequatchie Valley a few days since. He had a warrant for a man named Hankins, who was charged with violating the internal revenue law. Learning that he was at church, where a protracted meeting was in progress, he proceeded there and endeavored to spy out his man. His appearance at the church door had almost the effect of an unexpected attack of wild beasts. In an instant nearly every man in the building arose to his feet and began searching for some means of escape, each one fearing the officer had come for him. About the time half the congregation had succeeded in crawling out of the windows, the officer espied his man and commanded him to halt. Again the frightened ones thought their time had come, and each made a break for freedom, jostling the screaming women and children in their frantic efforts to get out of the building. The entire church was in an uproar, and the women seemed crazed with fear. At last the officer succeeded in arresting his man, and when convinced that all were not in danger, peace soon resumed its sway.

Notes and Clippings.

S. C. HALL, in his autobiography, says that he was "christened" by a clergyman who was so deeply in debt that he had a tunnel made from the church to the rectory to save himself from falling into the hands of the bailiffs.

"WONDER what's become of the Revised New Testament?" said Brown; "'pon my word I havn't seen a copy of it for a year." "Hav you seen a copy of the old version within a year?" asked Deacon Textual. "By gracious!" exclaimed Brown, "it's funny, but come to think of it, I havn't."

"Do you preach without notes?" casually asked a new minister from the East of an old preacher in an Arkansas conference. "Preach without notes?" echoed the brother, "I should say I did. Why, my dear brother, in the Lord's name, I've scarcely seen a greenback in six months." The subject was dropped.

OVER the door of a small frame building in which a colored family is living in Greenville, Tenn., is a pine board on which is the legend, now almost erased by rain and storm, "A. Johnson, Tailor." A little beyond the western border of the town is a marble monument that marks the last home of "Andrew Johnson, president of the United States."

SOME English judges are adopting the plan recommended by Mr. Howard Vincent at the Social Science Congress—that is, in the case of a first offense, under extenuating circumstances, to suspend sentence, and require the accused to find one surety for his coming up for judgment after a period of probation, when, if he is behaving well, he is discharged.

THE Abnakis Indians, in Maine, believe that meteors are the souls of the dead. Once a young Indian girl died, and the meteor which marked her death settled on the earth. But it was not content with the prairie or the forest, and found a resting-place on the surface of a lake. If one doubts the legend he can visit the lake and see the water lilies still growing there.

MARRIAGE, as practiced among the negroes of Senegambia, according to M. Berenger Feraud, is a very unstable institution. As in other parts of Africa, the parental tie is slight, divorce is a matter of every-day occurrence, women are to all intents and purposes slaves, and the marriages are attended with elaborate ceremonials simply as pretexts for amusement and intemperance.

"WE believe," says the Calamus Free Press, "that there is room enough on earth for the 'Saints' as well as the sinners, and if this country is to continue in the future as it has in the past, an asylum of refuge for all who seek to enjoy the blessings of civil and religious liberty, it is time to cease this war of extermination against the Mormons, and take a long and careful hunt after the glaring defects and immoral practices in the various religious doctrins promulgated nearer home.'

WENDELL PHILLIPS was riding in a railroad car, when he was addressed by a man of such rotundity that he seemed to carry everything before him. The man asked Mr. Phillips what was the object of his life. "To benefit the negro," was the bland reply. "Then why don't you go down South to do it?" "That is worth thinking of. I see a white cravat around your neck; pray what is the object of your life?" "To save souls from hell." "May I ask whether you propose to go to hell to do it?"—Religious Paper.

REPRESENTATIV CASSIDY, of Nevada, said that upon the first opportunity after the opening of Congress he will again introduce the bill prepared by him for the last Congress, calling for a record of marriages in Utah and disfranchising the women who vote. In the territory female suffrage is allowed, and it is one of the bulwarks of the Mormon church. The women, who are generally foreigners but recently proselyted, are mostly ignorant and know no rule but to vote as their husbands or the Mormon leaders direct.

A DISTINGUISHED physician, whose habit is to smoke five or six cigars every evening, but none at all during the day, has long pursued the plan of not smoking at all during the month of October. His idea is, he says, to allow his system to recuperate thirty days annually. The effect of tobacco, in his case, is a slight acceleration of the movement of the heart. This acceleration becomes clearly defined by the end of September, but ceases entirely at the beginning of November, after his period of abstinence, leaving him in good condition for another year's wrestle with the weed.

As an offset to the assertion so often made, that the Catholic church feels a deep concern for the education of the masses, the case of Spain, which is an absolute Catholic country, might be cited. According to official data just received at the Bureau of Education, Spain, with its hundred thousand priests and a population of 16,333,276, has 11,978,168 persons who can neither read nor write. Such a condition of affairs does not exist in any other civilized country on earth. Will Mgr. Capel please explain how far these facts go toward demonstrating that the mother church is the promoter of public education?—Inter-Ocean.

THE Rev. C. H. Afflerbach brings against the Infidel and Atheistic associations of America the charge that the guiding minds in them hav never been nativ-born Americans. Passing over the fact that Mr. Afflerbach's own name signifies that he is American only by a close shave, it may be remarked that the Protestants of the United States are just now celebrating the birth of the German, Martin Luther, who is as much a guiding mind as any other in Protestantism. This makes the charge against the Liberal organizations, even if it were true, which it is not, certainly a very inconsistent one, coming from a Protestant minister.

A METHODIST paper which comes every week to this office, and which ought to know better than to joke about everlasting things, tells the following rather good story about an old Methodist minister baptizing an infant: "He took the babe in his arms very affectionately, and addressed in a paternal fashion a few words of advice to the young parents: 'See that you train up the child the way that he should go; that you surround him with the best influences, and that you giv him a good example. If you do so, who knows but that he may become a Christmas Evans or John Elias? What is his name?' 'Jane, sir,' replied the mother."

THE Mississippi is a good instance of the variations through which some names hav passed. Its original spelling, and the nearest approach to the Algonquin word, "the father of waters," is Meche Sebe, a spelling still commonly used by the Louisiana Creoles. Touti suggested Miche Sepe, which is somewhat nearer to the present spelling. Father Laval still further modernized it into Michispi, which another father, Labatt, softened it into Misisipi, the first specimen of the present spelling. The only changes since hav been to overload the word with consonants. Marquette added the first and some other explorer the second "s," making it Mississipi, and so it remains in France to this day, with only one "p." The man who added the other has never been discovered, but he must hav been an American, for at the time of the purchase of Louisiana the name was generally spelled in the colony with a single "p."

OWING to the peculiarity of the Chinese characters, each of which represents a word, not a letter, as in our Western tongues, the Danish Telegraph Company (the Great Northern) working the new Chinese lines hav adopted the following device: There are from five to six thousand characters or words in ordinary Chinese language, and the company hav provided a wooden block or type for each of these. On one end of this block the character is cut or stamped out, and on the other end is a number representing the character. The clerk receives a message in numbers and takes the block of each number transmitted and stamps with the opposit end the proper Chinese character on the message form. Thus a Chinese message sent in figures is translated into Chinese characters again and forwarded to its destination. The sending clerk, of course, requires to know the numerical equivalent of the characters or hav them found for him.

THE Rev. Wm. Mitchell was installed a few days ago as pastor of the Congregational church at Westboro, Mass., having been called from the St. Andrew's Presbyterian church at St. John, N. B. On the morning of the 24th ult. he was arrested in Boston city for stealing a book from the counter in Clark & Carruthers's store in Washington street. He was first noticed in the book-store of Lockwood, Brooks & Co., on Franklin street, where he bought a small book, and then, while reading the catalog, slipped another book under his arm. When he left the store he was followed, and the clerk who watched him saw him take the book from under his arm and slip it into his pocket. He then went to Clark & Carruthers, and that firm, having been warned by Lockwood's clerk, watched him. He played the same game in this store. He was stopped at the door, and the stolen book was found in his possession. He offered $1,000 to hav the matter kept quiet, but a policeman was called in and the clergyman was placed under arrest.

ELDER JOHN F. DIEVENDORF, a farmer of Currytown, N. Y., attempted to murder his wife last week. Dievendorf is about sixty years old, in feeble health and is estimated as being worth about $100,000. He was an elder of the church. On Thursday night he retired with his wife. About midnight Mrs. Dievendorf was awakened by a pressure on her throat and discovered her husband bending over her, attempting to strangle her with a rope which he had put around her throat. After a severe struggle, in which her husband fought hard to get the better of her, she managed to break away from him and jumped from a window. Her cries aroused her married daughter and her husband, who were in the house, and who, together with some of the neighbors, took Mr. Dievendorf into custody and cared for the injured lady. Upon the bed in the room was found the halter. A complaint was made before Judge Fish, of Fultonville, who dispatched an officer, who, after arresting Elder Dievendorf, brought him before Judge Rulison, who committed him to the county jail to await examination.

ON a recent morning in Cincinnati a band of colored persons marched to the water's edge on the Ohio, just below the Cincinnati railway bridge, and directly opposit Sausage row, where the vilest negro desperadoes resort. They had come to take part in the ceremony of baptizing by immersion a newly-converted sister. The weather was very cool, and the early morning, when few people were stirring, was chosen to escape interruption. After a song and a prayer, the gowned minister and the candidate—a coal-black, stout young girl—waded slowly into the chilling water. The girl shivered at first, but, exhorted by the minister, she followed him until where the water was waist deep. Suddenly she made the Kentucky shores echo these words: "Lord-a-massa, I can't stan' dis; lemme go!" "But remember the Master's command, dear sister, and don't turn back to the wicked world," said the minister. "But I mus' go; it'll kill me, I know it will," the girl replied. She made a desperate effort to escape, but the parson held on, saying, as he struggled with his obstinate convert, "Yo' head mus' go under." In the effort to duck the girl's head both went under beyond their depth. They soon rose to the surface and floated down stream, shouting for help. Boats were at hand, and they were rescued in the usual way. Now the colored theologians are discussing whether or not this was a Christian baptism.

THE Rev. S. J. McPherson preached on a recent Sunday in the pulpit of Prof Swing, the heretical preacher of Chicago. A special meeting of the Presbytery has voted that the act "savored of impropriety in that it was setting an example which, if followed, might lead to evil."

A BRIDGETON, N. J., lawyer named Van Sycle, entered the office of the Patriot of that place, on Friday, the 23d ult., and shot Editor Cheeseman, inflicting a wound upon his chest. Believing himself to be fatally hurt, Cheeseman sprang upon his assailant, and beat his face to a jelly. Van Sycle will probably die. Cheeseman's wound is of a trifling nature.

DURING a year past the Rev. John Ford, a Methodist minister of Shelbyville, Ky., has been paying attention to Mrs. Walker, of the same place, and has sought her hand in marriage. She has persistently refused him. Mrs. Walker says that Ford, after begging her to marry him, made threats to shoot her if she did not consent. On Wednesday of last week he went to her house. Mrs. Walker ordered Ford out of the house and he refused to go. Mrs. Walker then got a shotgun loaded with No. 1 shot, and at close range disharged its contents into Ford's face and breast. Death occurred almost instantly.

Philosophical.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

We have, then, first of all, the objective material universe. In this material universe we discover a certain process called mind, the result of matter. Having established this relation of mind with matter, the question now is, How does knowledge occur?

In my previous article I used the word "intuition." I was misunderstood even by Mr. Andrews himself, and therefore I will not use it hereafter, for I utterly discard intuition as it is commonly understood. It is a most false light, and the source of a thousand errors.

In order fully to describe the processes of knowledge, I will use the words impression, sensation, perception, and reasoning. The first three are absolutely necessary to the last.

By impression, I mean the incoming or impingement of the outward universe upon the mind of man. I use impression in the same sense as I formerly used the word sensation.

By sensation, I mean the action or feeling of the mind as the result of the impression. I think Mr. Andrews uses the word in this sense. At any rate, I confine the word entirely to the mind's action—the action of the outward world being indicated by the word impression.

By perception, I mean the mind's seeing of the relations which necessarily exist between things. In the outward world there are things and relations. The things impress themselves upon the mind, and the mind instantly senses the thing and perceives the relation. This distinction between sensation and perception should be kept constantly in view. They are entirely different mental acts, though they occur together in time. The one is a movement, the other an insight.

After the impression, the sensation, and the perception comes reasoning, and not till then. There is not a particle of reasoning in the human mind until it has received an impression from the outside "universe of things," sensed the things, and perceived relations. This is the absolutely necessary foundation to all reasoning. But not the absolutely necessary foundation of all knowledge, for before reasoning there is a knowledge—there must be, or reasoning is impossible. We must know something, or else how can we reason?

I affirm that in sensation and perception is involved the knowledge of the universe as outward—that is, we know that the universe is outside of us and not in us, that it is something other than ourselves. We do not pass, as I have said before, from the ego to the non-ego by any process of inference, but in the very act of consciousness the non-ego is known instantly with the ego; and, the moment we know ourselves, that moment we recognize the reality of what is not ourselves. This knowledge, I say, is anterior to all reasoning and all experience. It is conveyed to us by the mind's sensation and perception. In the sensation of the thing, it knows the thing to be outward, and in perceiving the relation between things, it knows those relations to be outward. Understand me—this is all the mind does know prior to reasoning, outwardness; all other knowledge comes by reasoning, but objectivity is directly cognized.

Right here is a fundamental difference between myself and Mr. Andrews. Right here is the very innermost battle-ground of our philosophies. I affirm that science must take the position which I take, or else it will vanish in a maze of philosophic speculation. It must start with the affirmation of a direct knowledge of the objectivity of things and relations, or else it can never affirm a single thing beyond the individual ego.

Mr. Andrews affirms, if I understand him aright, that the knowledge of the objectivity of relations is not involved in sensation and perception, as I assert; but this knowledge comes by a lightning-like process of reasoning, of inference—that is, the mind, sensing and perceiving, asks for a cause of its operations, and infers as the cause the existence of something outside of itself. This is done, it is said, in response to the mind's necessary demand for a cause. But I deny that the mind makes any such demand. The idea of causation is not original and intuitive. It is the result of many experiences. When we see that some antecedents have certain consequences, then we begin to think of causes, and not till then. The mind does not begin to think of a cause the first thing, as if by compulsion. A very little consideration will convince any one that the idea of causation is not instinctive, but an idea produced by experience, and even then all the idea we have of cause is that certain antecedents are followed by certain consequences—and not that one thing produces another. But if we are obliged to seek for a cause of our mental operations, why seek for them outside? Why not affirm that the cause is inside? This can be done just as well, and this is what Berkeley does, and he denies the existence of anything outward, and he is just as logical as those who declare that the outward world is an inference. But how is it possible to locate a cause either inside or outside? It cannot logically be done, and the result is that we are left floating on a "sea of thought," and there is no certainty—except, indeed, of our uncertainty. After all this questioning, however, when a man opens his eyes and appeals to common sense he is well aware that he is but part of a world, and he only knows himself as part of a world which is not himself: that is, as I have before affirmed, in the primal act of consciousness is involved the knowledge of the outside universe. This knowledge comes directly. We never could reason ourselves to it. It must come before all inference, or it could never come at all.

I know that in this matter I not only place myself against Mr. Andrews, but against Spencer and Huxley; but these men are not science—every man is liable to mistake, and science is that best knowledge which the combined intellects of the race present. We must offset one great thinker against another frequently in order to get at the truth, as we must offset one sense against another. Our senses are the only source of knowledge; but our senses make false reports and we must sift our senses by our senses continually, in order to make them exact witnesses; and so we must sift scientists by scientists. It does not follow that Spencer or Huxley is right on all questions because they are right on some. It is absurd to make any one man, however learned, or any set of men, a supreme authority on all questions that are presented to the human intellect.

Now, this question which I am discussing must be settled by the common sense of the world. Each one of my readers can decide for himself. It does not need learning or genius—only clear-headedness. Let each one ask himself, how does he know that there is a world outside of himself? I venture to say that everybody who has not bothered himself with metaphysics will say that he knows it in the same way that he knows himself. The moment I see a table, a chair, a flower, a star, the mountains, the seas, I know that they are outside of me; I perceive it; I don't reason it. It is impossible to reason it. The moment I reason I am lost in a wilderness of thought. The firm starting-point is the objectiv reality.

This is the difference between Mr. Andrews and myself. He says that knowledge of things as objective is not involved in sensation and perception, but is reached after sensation and perception by a lightning-like process of inference. I affirm that in sensation and perception is contained a knowledge of the objectivity of the world; and this knowledge is the starting-point of all scientific reasoning. I affirm that there is not a particle of reasoning until after an impression, a sensation, and a perception. These three things are necessary to any reasoning whatsoever. I am perfectly satisfied that the common sense of the world will vindicate my position.

I will now endeavor to show what reasoning is; or, at least, its two main processes—the inductive and the deductive—the reasoning from a particular to a general, and from a general to a particular.

Reasoning is, first of all, inductive. It deals with particulars. There is analysis, the making of distinctions; and then there is the discovery of resemblances. From a certain number of particulars, classified and harmonized, a general truth is affirmed, and from this general truth there is a deduction, or a reasoning forth to other particulars.

Now, the trouble with philosophy in past ages has been that it has almost altogether contented itself with deduction. It has assumed its general, and from that deduced its particulars. Grant its general, and of course its particulars are logically true. But if the general is not true, the particular is not apt to be true, except by a happy guess. Almost all philosophers make some "glittering generality" their starting-point, but however beautiful the result, it is purely imaginary.

Philosophy in the hereafter, in order to be of any account, must base itself entirely upon science. Its generals must be given by the patient researches of science. It must not take anything for granted. It is the province of philosophy, as distinguished from science, to deal with general truths and apply them to the various and particular affairs of human life.

Science is mostly analytic; philosophy is synthetic. Science walks with slow and patient footstep. When it has won some hight of knowledge, then philosophy, dealing with broad outlooks, comes in. Philosophy is simply the highest realm of science—its sublimest activity, applied mainly to life, and therefore in the end it is wisdom. But it must be kept in view that all the advances of philosophy must have a strictly scientific base. Philosophy cannot transcend science. If science cannot solve the problem of life, neither can philosophy. The latter can have no instrumentality that the former does not furnish. The trouble, however, has been from, Plato to Hegel and Andrews, that philosophers have assumed a premise that science does not give. They solve the problem of the universe by, first of all, making a universe to suit themselves. When one has made a doll-baby it is very easy to unfold the process of its manufacture, and so make plain the heart of its mystery. So one can deal very nicely with an imaginary universe. He can have a place for everything, and can put everything in its place. He can pigeon-hole good and evil, and demonstrate how exquisitely they supply one another's defects. One can label God and man and the devil, and have them at hand to solve every difficulty. It is a far more difficult task, however, to solve this matter-of-fact universe, and bring out from its tremendously conflicting forces some sort of harmony. Science only can express the least valid music. It may not bring forth much, but what it does has the genuine ring. Philosophy has hitherto won but scanty triumphs. It has roamed amid the dreamlands. It has dealt with ideas, and not with facts. It has made the universe anything and everything to suit some passing fancy. It has had its types and archetypes, and according to these everything has been evolved in a very attractive manner. Philosophy has been, in fact, nothing but prose-poetry, and on the whole I prefer Shakspere to Plato. Poetry built upon facts is better than philosophy built upon fancy.

I would not, however, do without the philosopher He is a grand man, provided he sticks to the orbit marked out for him by science. There are some minds essentially deductive. It is their forte to go from the general to the particular. Deductive reasoning, as the strict result of inductive reasoning, is the highest form of man's intellectual activity. It is through deduction that we reach the grandest results. We are compelled daily to this form of reasoning. Through it only can we meet successfully the new issues of life constantly thrust upon us. We cannot apply the particular to the particulars. It is a slow and cumbersome process. From a vast number of particulars, general principles must be stored up in the mind, and he is the most successful man who has the quickest control of these universal truths in their varied adaptability to the particular circumstances of life. Hence the sublime use of the philosopher, who trains us into the grasp and use of the most general principles, and thus enables us to be beforehand with life, and marshal, as with a master's insight, its multitudinous forces. Many of the most brilliant and useful discoveries have been entirely the result of deduction; and he who can lead and instruct in these superior processes of thought is indeed a noble helper. But in order that philosophy in its wide reach may be thus fruitful and glorious, its deduction must be based entirely upon induction. It must not begin with assumed generals. It must find them in the strict search of science. Every general must be derived from particulars. We begin with particulars always; and only after a most exhaustive examination do we admit the general. This is why theology cannot stand. It starts with a most tremendous assumption. It does not reason from a particular to a general. If it did, how could it ever reach to a God?—for, unless all the particulars of the universe are present to the mind, it is impossible to demonstrate God. God is the very last generality that can be reached, and it cannot be reached until every part and parcel of the universe has been thoroughly examined. As this will not be done for millions of years, of course this general conclusion is a long way off; and if there is to be in the hereafter a theology, it will be so many countless years before the demonstration is fully accomplished that it is not worth our while to be bothered with such a remote affair. If theology is assumed to-day, it is assumed against the facts that we already know. As a general theory, it has but a few particulars to give it credence. The theologian reasons from ideas to ideas, and not from facts to ideas. Now every reasoning, to be veracious, must be from facts to ideas.

In the light of what I have just said, I wish to examine for a moment the basis of Universology, and see if it has a real scientific basis.

Of course Mr. Andrews will not say that we must accept Universology by "intuition" or "faith." We must not begin to believe it in order to see if it is true, although it strikes me that some of his disciples would like to have me try it in that way, just as Moody insists that we first of all believe in Christianity, and then by believing it we shall come to find out that it is true. Are we to accept Universology in this way—by some transcendent effort of the will?

This cannot be done—at least, no scientific truth can be accepted in this way. It must be reasoned out, as I have said, by induction. If it cannot be reasoned out in this way, then it cannot be accepted by the scientific mind.

Universology is a general truth. As its name betokens, it is a universal principle. Therefore, being a general truth, it cannot be assumed; it must be demonstrated by an appeal to particulars. As I understand it, Universology declares that between the inward and the outward world there is a perfect analogy. Now, this is very well as an hypothesis, and as an hypothesis it is very useful. Many of Mr. Andrews's analogies are wonderfully entertaining and instructive. They are real diamonds of thought, that seem to flash the truth like so many gems of poetry, like some of Homer's or Shakspere's splendid lines. But, to me, they are simply glimpses, and not established principles. The only possible way to demonstrate general analogy is by an examination of the particular analogies. We cannot assume general analogy, and from that reason to particular analogies. We must first have our millions of particular analogies, and on these millions establish the truth of the general. We cannot assume the general, and then assert the millions of particulars.

The Armies of the Lord.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following article, clipped from the Modesto Herald, may be of some interest to those of your readers who are not posted in regard to the affairs of Zion in California:

"Rev. W. S. Urmy has placed upon our table a copy of the 'Minutes of the Thirty-First Session of the California Conference of the M. E. Church.' We were particularly attracted to the statistical part of the report, and not a little surprised to find the total membership in the state to be only 8,793, with 1,125 on probation. The whole number of churches is 137, and the number of Sunday-school children 14,978. San Francisco alone ought to present this many."

When you understand that the population of California is now nearly one million, you will perceive that, even with the extremely Liberal mode of counting for which they are noted, the Methodists, after thirty-one years, hav succeeded in building up a membership of only about one to each hundred inhabitants. When you understand that a great portion of these members were Methodists before they came to California; when you understand that a great portion of these are so lukewarm in their cause that their preachers complain of them nearly every week; and when you understand that, notwithstanding this unfavorable showing, the Methodists are, next to the Catholics, the dominant sect in this state, you will perceive that the "armies of the Lord" are not winning many victories over the "adversary of souls." Indeed, after twelve years of close observation, I am satisfied that the number of those who hav become church-members in California, and hav remained members, is more than equaled by that of those who came here as members and hav abandoned the churches since their arrival.

From this same article you will see that this dominant sect, the Methodists, hav only one church to each seven thousand inhabitants; and you would be surprised to see how small the congregations are at these few churches.

From all these things you will perceive that California is not likely to aid much in putting God, and his mother, and his son, and his son's mother (God had no wife), and his uncle, the Holy Ghost, et al, into the Constitution of the United States.

JOHN R. KELSO.

Turlock, Cal., Nov. 10, 283.

Mr. Heywood.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER and other sources that Mr. Heywood's obscenity case in the criminal court at Worcester last week goes over until the January term, when it must be tried; and that, too, according to law—so says Judge Aldrich; and the district attorney, good-natured soul, throws the whole weight of this prosecution upon Mr. Heywood, and tells him if he will stop publishing at once that ends the case. I suppose you would counsel him to follow Blackman's suggestion and so get out of his present "trouble—and keep out."*

That is just what my wife says. She says Mr. Heywood is too good a man to be harassed in this way. She further says Mr. Heywood is too poor to be put to such costs; that his brother, Samuel R., might take the job off his hands and relieve his brother Ezra as he used to when he was helping him get Mountain Home.

And then, she still further says, Mr. Heywood has a family of four young children to provide for and educate; a wife also, who can be of much service in her family, but of no avail in the state's prison, and she would hav Mr. Heywood lay aside his reforms till a more convenient season, when his opinions hav become generally known and taught in the schools. Then he might get a call to preach for hire, and get as rich as the pious sneak who pillows with the traveling agent of the National Insurance Company. Now, all this and more was in your thought when you published your notice on the 10th inst. But do you know this man Heywood? Why, he is of such stuff as, a few years before, they used to make into Garrisons, and Pillsburys, Phillipses, and Fosters. "I am in earnest; I will not retreat; I will be heard!" is his motto. Are you, as a reformer, really prepared to counsel in such wise? I know it is a great work he takes upon his hands, and it requires a great man to bend to the load; but are you willing to see the the last arrow in freedom's quiver plucked away rather than suffer in its defense? Did you so counsel our honored innovator, D. M. Bennett? Heywood has glorious examples, all the way down the ages—glorious ages—made glorious for our sake. We cannot pay to the past the debt we owe; let the present and future draw on us. Heywood is fighting for education and freedom. Shall a Jeffries and a Laud feed their bigotry on the freedom of American citizens? Shall domestic ties stand in the way of blazing truth? Read the story of Mr. John Rogers, the father of five more children, quite as young as Mr. Heywood's; yet that stern old divine defied the flames of the persecuting Mary, and would not lie to save his life. Think of that, Mr. Aldrich, and you, Mr. Blackman; for your laws must be feeble things, compared with your prejudices, when they can be of no avail if the prosecuting officer can be bribed with a criminal's promis to "do so no more."

According to Aldrich, no man shall make a practical protest against a law, however infamous.

Tell that barrister that there is strength, and flavor too, in Boston harbor. Was it wicked to defy the excise laws of the land? "It may be treason to England—it is obedience to God," they said; and that saying will never be unsaid while a despot reigns on the throne or on the bench.

Let Liberals stand by Liberals, and do all they can to create popular sentiment in Liberal molds. We don't know whose turn next. Success to-day insures a new victory to-morrow. Rebuff to-day precurses defeat to-morrow.

Heywood asks your aid, your help; your pity he may need after the trial. A. H. WOOD.

Lunenburg, Mass.

*We should most certainly advise against the writing by Mrs. Heywood of any more stuff such as the slip Mr. Heywood is now indicted on. The English language is flexible enough to express any sentiments that worthy lady may hold without the use of words which must be deprecated by her most stanch supporters before they can proceed to her defense. Mrs. Besant traveled the ground over which Mrs. Heywood is stumbling, and did not find it necessary to bedraggle her skirts with mud to get people to listen to her. —[ED. T. S.]

More Bible Polygamy and Blunders.

The proofs that polygamy was a favored institution of Jehovah in his government of the Jews are almost innumerable in the Bible. David is nowhere rebuked for his many wives, and is ever spoken of as the favorit of his God. Solomon is reprovingly spoken of because he took wives among the strange people, but not for his having so many hundreds of wives and concubines. 2 Chronicles xi, 17, "So they strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and made Rheoboam, son of Solomon, strong, three years; for three years they walked in the way of David and Solomon." It then states that Rheoboam took Mahalath and Maachah to wife, and loved this last above all his wives and concubines, "for he took eighteen wives and three score concubines," "and he dealt wisely and dispersed all his children throughout all countries of Judah," etc. "And he desired many wives."

Now, this is spoken of approvingly. It is recorded as a part of his wise dealing. But to make it clearer, in the very beginning of the next chapter (xii) it states, "It came to pass when Rheoboam had established and strengthened himself, he forsook the law of the Lord." How? 1 Kings xiv, 21, 24, tells how. Chapter xi, 6, says, "David went fully after the Lord," as does verse 34. And we know what David did. It seems that while Rheaboam desired and had so many wives, he obeyed the Lord and followed him. This case alone is enough to show that polygamy is a Bible institution. But no one in his proper senses to-day can read a few chapters of the book without seeing the absurdity of quoting it as authority save where it states an evident truth. It overflows with blunders. In looking up this point I came across one I had not seen commented on before. According to 2 Kings xxiii, 1–3, over a million people entered the temple with King Josiah. All the men of Judah, all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, "all the people, small and great." Another miracle. HOLT.

Maine Facilities for Drinking.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I desire, simply in the interest of truth, to correct one erroneous statement that occurs in the communication signed "Liberta," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 10th, relativ to the effect of alleged prohibition in Maine. The statement is as follows: "If it [liquor] can be sold openly, it is not sold secretly; and if sold secretly, it is because it cannot be sold openly." I contradict the two propositions contained in this quotation without hesitation, because I know from my own experience that the facts are otherwise. There are now places in Portland, Maine, where liquor is sold openly, and also places where it is sold secretly; some of the former places are in the neighborhood of the Boston and Maine and Eastern depots. The latter are in a more central location. I think I recollect one in Middle street, and one in Exchange street, to which I hav been invited. The persons who use the secret places either let themselvs in with keys, no one without a key being admitted by anyone inside, or they are inspected from the inside through a "peep hole," in a style similar to that in which the applicant for admission to a gambling-house is in many cities examined by the custodian of the door before being allowed to enter. When in Portland, I hav been frequently invited to drink by a railroad conductor, who sometimes is so drunk when on duty on his train that he is unable to be in charge of it, and resigns the charge to the baggage-master.

This man, like some locomotiv engineers, and others who frequent these places, would not dare to drink to excess except for the fact that he can do so with but slight danger of detection, owing to the secrecy with which they are conducted, an immunity from danger (from danger of detection in the act, but certainly not from danger to the lives of the passengers or property of these corporations under their charge) that is solely and directly served to them by the so-called prohibition laws. About the reason why liquor is sold, both openly and secretly, which "Liberta" finds it so hard to realize, I know, probably, no more than anyone of average common sense, but it seems to me not very difficult to see what it is. Is not the case this? Liquor is sold openly, because, if it were not, a great many people who now buy it would be put to so much trouble to ascertain where it could be obtained that they would rather go without it, and the dealer lose custom in that way; it is sold secretly, because, as I hav said, many men in positions of responsibility, such as locomotiv engineers and railroad conductors, would otherwise not dare to drink to excess as they now do, and the dealers would lose a profitable part of their custom in that way.

One thing more I desire to say. One day recently, about noon, I saw three gentlemen in Portland, all so intoxicated that no one of them could walk without staggering very perceptibly. This improving spectacle occurred on a day that was not a holiday, and the three gentlemen were not together, but each one of them was alone, although they were all within a circle of fifty yards radius. Surely if the prohibitionists are satisfied, those who want to get drunk hav no particular reason to complain.

48 Wall street, N. Y. PHILIP G. PEABODY.

A Great Want.

There is a branch of study than which nothing is more needed in our common schools. It is literary criticism. The man who will get up a plain, brief, but clear book for schools on this subject will be a benefactor of his kind, and will, I believe, realize a fortune. The ordinary "Logics" are too dry and obscure and impractical.

Sydney Smith's essay on "Popular Fallacies," with his immortal oration of Mr. Noodle, illustrate my idea, as also does Macaulay's essay on "Southey's 'Colloquies on Society.'" The work criticised by Macaulay in that essay shows the need of the introduction into common schools of the study I mention. A very little training in the art of literary criticism would hav prevented Southey, the poet, from writing such absurdities as he did in the work. But, as the critic says, he did seem to be utterly ignorant of what an argument is. One might be excused for uttering such folly at his own fireside, but that anyone should deliberately write it down, send it to the printer, correct the proof-sheets, and then giv it to the public, makes us ashamed of our species. I will venture the assertion that not one person in a hundred, outside of the legal profession, could read the work and detect the fallacies, contradictions, and absurdities contained in that work, prior to having read some criticism on it like Macaulay's. People read books and listen to addresses teeming with baldest fallacies and contradictions without the least suspicion. Even learned men accept theories and write exhaustiv works on them without ever pausing to ask, "But is the theory true?" Often a very little clear thinking will show the foundation to be false. The very wisest and most capable will fall into error thus.

We daily find people taking for granted some false premis and building splendid edifices thereon. We meet with people of good sense upholding most false doctrins, utterly incapable of reasoning on the subjects.

A very little training in the right direction would prevent this.

People also giv false reasons for correct views. I am satisfied that there is a class of citizens who find their interest in this stupidity, and who would oppose any attempt to reform our schools on this point.

A great many persons hav come to believe there is no such thing as truth from hearing a cause maintained and disputed with ability on both sides.

Such a work as I speak of, with a few illustrations by such articles as Macaulay's and Smith's, would, with the proper training, teach the rising generation the habit of clear thinking. A fallacy, if not detected by most of them, could be easily exposed to them.

As it is, when you try to show to them that such or such a statement is self-contradictory, is a begging of the question, or some other fallacy, you speak an unknown language. They do not see why a statement may not be true, although it may be contrary to the established canons of criticism, and logically false, and you hav often no means of showing them, because you cannot appeal to anything that is authority with them.

The sole cause of the superior intelligence of lawyers is because some of these canons are authority with them, to a certain extent. A keen lawyer will detect a fallacy very readily. C. I.

Prohibition.—Temperance.

To say anything upon temperance, intemperance, moderation, or prohibition, which has not been said, or which would not be a remuttering of the same thunder which has been heard almost constantly for the last forty years, would be a task for the fulfilment of which the writer is hardly capacitated. Intemperance, meaning the excessiv use of, and temperance, meaning the moderate use of whisky? Yes, and many other things, too numerous to mention, which might appropriately enter into a discussion in favor of or against prohibition.

The constitution of man, meteorological and isothermal influence, morphological and physiological conditions, or the effects brought about from the relation of form and function, are vastly of more importance than the clamor about the excessiv use of whisky and alcoholic stimulants. A knowledge and observance of the law of cause and effect would be worth more than all the temperance speeches ever made.

To repeat that the direct and immediate effect of the excessiv use of intoxicants is in many ways demoralizing and productiv of numerous evils, is only to giv expression to what our every-day observation and experience prove. Nothing is more profoundly sad than the haggard look of the wife whose husband is a drunkard. Nothing more completely withers parental hopes than a knowledge of their bright-faced boy being a tippler.

But, to go back of this state of affairs and become acquainted with and explain the causes, of which these sad sights are but the natural effects, is indeed a difficult task. Nothing happens without a cause. For every thought and every act there must be a cause, and to understand the causes of so much drunken wretchedness would require a tolerably complete sociological, physiological, and biological knowledge.

Why is it that a portion of mankind, with their eyes open, and with intelligence enough to see ahead of them the detestable drunkard, reeling, staggering, and basking in filth, with his brain partially paralyzed, and his nervous system prostrated, despite the prayers of Christians, the appeals of anxious friends, why is it, I ask, that some people continue in this awful practice and remain in this deplorable condition?

Make an appeal to the drunkard's intelligence, and will he excuse himself by telling you that the taste of whisky is so pleasant to his palate that restraint is impossible? No. Does he delight in being dragged down from his social rank; from a loving wife or an interesting family? No. Is it a pleasure to sink down, step by step, and drink after drink, until he has reached the level of a drunkard, and further down until he has gone below the level of the savage, the beast, and the idiot, and still further until sympathetic friends place nature's deformed father, brother, or husband, beneath the sod? No; the sot, the debauchee, does not inform you, upon interrogating him, that it accords with his wishes or adds to his pleasures to be a drunkard. The cause must be a very strong one, or the final effect would tend to crush the action. The desire, the promptings of an unnatural appetite, must be such as disregard consequences, and the victim continues until thoughtful minds hav busied themselvs searching for a remedy; and it only too sad to know that every effort, thus far, has b: en a hopeless failure.

Without a proper knowledge of the cause it has been impossible to change the effect; and now arises the momentous question: What would be the effect of legislativ prohibition? Temperance agitators, honest and zealous workers, do not jump at a hasty conclusion. It may be questionable as to whether reformation of any kind has ever been effected by legislation. We are searching for the cause as well as the remedy, and we believe the cause to be that of an imperfect organization, and the remedy to be not legislativ prohibition.

We hav asked why it is that some people indulge in a practice that makes life more miserable than death, and we believe that it is not because the natural products of the fair fields of earth are converted into intoxicants, nor because whisky is offered for sale on all sides (I am not now considering the moral right to sell whisky). We are now dealing with the cause and effect in connection with prohibition as a pseudo-remedy, and at the same time giving our own idea of a proper treatment.

We assume the cause to be an imperfect organization, inherited or acquired, the improper development of which givs rise to and encourages this abnormal and unnatural appetite, to the extent that to resist stimulants and intoxicants is equal to a consumptiv refusing to cough.

If there was intemperance only in the use and abuse of whisky, the question would be more easy of solution. If alcohol and the milder beverages were the only stimulants, the cause might be more easily understood. But nature has produced hundreds of other stimulants and intoxicants, and if prohibition were to become a law, and man's organization remaining unchanged, unimproved, his appetites and passions in harmony with form and function, in my opinion the drunkard's condition would not be improved nor society become a whit better. As a matter of fact, if there was no whisky made and none sold, no one could drink it; but is that equivalent to saying there would be no drunkenness? Certainly not. We all know that there are other intoxicants, which, if not so boisterous, are equally demoralizing. And when there is inherited an organization, the development of which develops the desire, the passion, the appetite for strong drink, would it not be in accordance with the law of cause and effect for those unfortunates to seek gratification and indulgence in other forms of intoxication?

Suppose, for instance, that prohibition was in full force, that no whisky was made nor sold, then what? The taste of whisky is not the thing desired. Every sot will truthfully tell you that oftentimes he has had to vomit two, three, or four times before his drink would remain on his stomach. It did not taste good; the effect was what was wanted. But, says one, remove by legislativ prohibition the drink (whisky) and then you will annul the effect. Not at all. You havn't touched the cause, which is the desire for the effect, whisky, or whatever stimulant taken, simply producing the effect desired. To remove the cause or desire you must renovate the system by breaking the sot's associations (if the case has not become too chronic) and remodeling the organizations by a purely physiological process. Knowing nature's laws, and living in obedience therewith, and the transmission of sound, healthy bodies to our children, which will enable them to come in contact with stimulants and crime in every form, and though the evils of the land, in our opinion, never hav been, and never will be, lessened by legislation, they may be defied, both the natural and the artificial. But what are the natural and artificial evils to be defied? Natural evils are those inherited, transmitted from parent to child, and from generation to generation. A natural propensity in harmony with the organization which leads the victim, in spite of his own resolutions, his pledges, and his prayers, to acts, the effects of which are not conduciv to his own well being, and are detrimental to the good of society, of which every one is a part. This abnormal condition of the system is, properly speaking, a disease, and, if defied, must be made to yield, not to legislativ prohibition, but to proper social treatment; not consisting of patent medicins, nor bottled nostrums, but to the influence of good, interesting, and wholesome society. And, as a fully developed case of consumption cannot be cured, so with the fully developed sot. Let the habitual drunkard go. The law of the "survival of the fittest" will soon root him out. Nature tears down to rebuild a little better, and in place of the drunken jimson, we may hav the fragrant rose. Throw no halo of praise around the debauchee upon a pretended reformation or the signing of a pledge. These things hav been tried, and are found wanting. If there is any manhood left in the drunkard it will assert itself when society no longer recognizes him in any of the relations of life. Seek rather to save those who may become drunkards, and this class will include both those who may hav inherited the propensity for drinking, and those (including the artificial evils) in whom a desire may be developed, or acquired by adaptation or bad association.

Legislativ prohibition would not keep the consumptiv from coughing, nor would it keep the confirmed drunkard from becoming intoxicated. But good exercise, mental and physical, and a pure atmosphere may act as a preventiv against the development of consumption, both in those who may hav inherited weak lungs, and those who may contract the disease by continued exposure, and the same treatment, viz: interesting games and amusements, making home more attractiv and inviting than the saloons and dens of vice, will do a hundred times more good toward diminishing the number of drunkards than all the legislativ prohibition, temperance crusades, or Murphy movements.

Kansas says that prohibition will not prohibit; Maine echoes the same mournful answer. History proves that crusades and prayers alike hav been ineffectual. Now let the intellectual and moral world try social banishment. Let the confirmed drunkard go; he is a sore upon society, an insult to decency. His manhood is not worth the blue ribbon with which he adorns himself when he signs the pledge. Instead of trying to save that which is not worth saving, let us study the law of conduct, of cause and effect. Let us acquaint ourselvs with the proper conditions and environments of life, and let us educate our children in such manner that they may abhor intemperance and crime in every form.

And thou art done with fears:
Man gets no other light,
Search he a thousand years."

CHICAGO has a new kind of religion called the "ham sandwich." A party of evangelists preach on the courthouse steps on Sunday, for a while, announcing that instead of the usual collection being taken up, a free lunch of ham sandwich and coffee will be given. Last Sunday, about a hundred poor people were fed, after they had listened to the word for an hour. This sort of getting in religious work ought to become popular with congregations, as there is nothing which does a poor, hungry soul as much good as a sandwich and a cup of coffee. The residents of Biler avenue may not take kindly to the preaching at first, but they will stay to lunch with the exhorter, every time, and while the lamp holds out, to keep the coffee hot, the vilest sinner may return after more sandwiches.—Peck's Sun.

"Crush the Damned Serpent."

It is high time that to the search after truth we should add the labor of stamping out falsehood. The grand value of philosophy is in its purpose, not in its mystery. He who would throw away truth for the pleasure of hunting for it again does not comprehend its nature. Philosophy is not a puzzle good only for amusement, but an acquisition of knowledge and a disciplin of faculties to effect our welfare. Mystics and ecclesiastics liv by their wonder or upon the wonder of others. Philosophers use their knowledge to apply nature's riches. To those who hav found any truth I urge that they act in earnest to prevent ignorance from again becoming dominant.

The American bishops of the Romish church hav demanded of the United States government the acceptance of ecclesiastical canon law in all matters relating to church and state. This is a bold unmasking of the long concealed purpose of the God-like tyrant to gain control of a government that was founded in opposition to its atrocious claims and crimes. Mentioning this to a Bible agent, he answered, "Let them try on their game, and the American people will arise in its might and crush the damned serpent." To be forewarned is a call to be forearmed. The war is inevitable.

Norfolk, Va., Nov. 15, 1883. JOHN H. P. GUILD.

"Common Sense" Answered in Extenso.

A pretty definit and satisfactory answer to the inquiry of "Common Sense," about the family of Joseph, the carpenter, will be found in "Revelations of Antichrist," which, in chapter xl, gives an abridgment of all the apocryphal gospels. The following extract from chapter xxv, entitled "The Three Apostles James," is especially pertinent to the inquiry:

How the perpetual virgin Mary became the mother of a large family is no mystery like that of the miraculous conception. One of the early apocryphal gospels—though probably not so early as any of our four—tells us all about it. Joseph was a widower with four sons and two daughters, all married but James and Judas. Joseph was a priest as well as a carpenter, but lived mostly by the latter trade. Mary had been brought up in the temple till she was twelve years old, when the priests, lest they should fall into temptation and thus incur God's anger, agreed to intrust her to the fatherly care of some pious old man who wanted a young wife. So they assembled twelve old men who raffled for Mary. The ex-priest and carpenter won, and was betrothed to her at once, the marriage to be postponed until she reached a suitable age. But he took her to his own house and kept her two years, when she became a mother by the holy ghost.

When Joseph discovered what was the matter with Mary he became sorely troubled, and couldn't eat or drink for a whole day. He thought of hushing up the scandal by putting her away secretly. It is not said whether he suspected his son James, who was most tenderly attached to his prospectiv stepmother. When she first came she found him broken-hearted at the recent loss of his own mother, but the advent of a lovely maiden, who, though some years in his junior, assumed the relation of a mother to him, soon assuaged his grief; and she, caring for him as only a loving step-mother knows how, became known as "the mother of James," even before she became a wife to his father. The absence of the old gentleman, who had to be away at work at his trade, to say nothing of his age, which was then ninety-two, no doubt tended to strengthen the ties between the son and his female guardian.

But Joseph did not long remain on the ragged edge of anguish and despair. In the midst of his distress he fell asleep at noonday and had a dream, in which Gabriel appeared to him and explained the mystery of the immaculate conception. That was enough; the angelic friend tied up the storm, and so far as we know, everybody was satisfied of the entire innocence of all concerned. The far-off Magi made haste to welcome the new-born king of the Jews, and even the wicked Herod was wroth with them for not telling him where the infant was, so that he might go and worship him also.

The bird sang in Mary's heart. Such a child would render any household happy. Jesus grew up and lived in sweet accord with his two half-brothers, Judas and James, until the death of their father, Joseph, at the ripe old age of 111. Mary never had another child. Jesus addressed her reverently as his "virgin mother." Joseph, though legally married, seems not to hav been a husband to her with all that the name implies.

Some readers may think the above a burlesque. On the contrary, it is taken almost literally from the "History of Joseph, the Carpenter," a book that was popular in the so-called evangelical age of the church. If the style of the paraphrase should be thought satirical, or irreverent, will any right-minded person pretend to say that such a story deserves any better treatment?

The Philosophy of Life.

It is conceded that our present state of existence is life, or is known by that term. It may be an arbitrary assumption to call it by that name, but nothing in comparison to the arbitrary power that projects and forces us into this state of being without any cognizance of our own. By that act we are oftener than otherwise landed on an inhospitable shore, and our speedy departure to an unknown clime is not mourned unless done outwardly. From the earliest times we hav read much about living, moving, and having our being, and God is thanked daily for it. Credit is not always given where credit is due. We are told that "God is love, impartial, unchangeable, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." If life, and what it implies, depend on such attributes, all things would tend to our improvement and happiness. Do such conditions always attend us from birth? To ask the question is to answer it. We read that God is partial. "For the children being not yet born, neither having done any good or evil, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth. As it is written, Jacob's house hav I loved, but Esau hav I hated" (Rom. ix, 11–13.). We cannot depend on anything so absurd and unsubstantial as that to sustain us. The hated one proved to be the better man. What shall we do? Let the mistakes of those who hav gone before us be a lesson. Learn on what they depended for help, and if it proved a broken reed. The senses are the beginning and the end of knowledge.

> "Of truth, whate'er discoveries are made,
> Are by the senses to us first conveyed;
> Nor will one sense be baffled; for on what > Can we rely more safely than on that?"

All of the race hav aspirations and hopes of being in better circumstances and improving their condition. Why are they not realized? From the earliest traditions, all races hav been taught and commanded to look to their priests as their teachers. They hav been taught to ignore the present, to tend all their efforts and utilize all their means to save themselvs from imaginary evils in a future imaginary state of existence. Yet they do not agree as to methods of belief, hence this planet has been made a slaughter-house for the race.

> "Look round the globe—for near two thousand years
> The cross has deluged it with blood and tears.
> Has it not set, wherever it was known,
> Wife against husband, father against son?
> To love your wife or child's a grand mistake—
> You're taught to hate each other for Christ's sake
> —(Luke xii).
> Take no thought for to-day! and when you die
> The dead may bury you, or there you lie."
> —(Luke ix).

The following is a description of hell by the Rev. J. Furniss, and was published by authority in England: "The roof is red-hot, the walls are red-hot, the floor is like a thick sheet of red-hot iron. See, on the middle of that red-hot iron floor stands a girl. She looks about sixteen years of age. She has neither shoes nor stockings on her feet. The door of this room has never been opened since she first set her feet on this red-hot floor. Now she sees the door opening. She rushes forward. She has gone down upon her knees on the red-hot floor. Listen, she speaks. She says: 'I hav been standing with my bare feet on this red-hot floor for years. Day and night my only standing-place has been this red-hot floor. Look at my burnt and bleeding feet. Let me go off this burning floor for one moment—only for a short moment. Oh! that in this endless eternity of years I might forget the pain only for one single moment!' The devil answers her question. 'Do you call for a moment—for one moment to forget your pain? No! not for one single moment during the never-ending eternity of years shall you ever leave this red-hot floor!'"

What is life to those that are brought up under such teachings? Its belief has taken away mental liberty, and individual rights, without which there can be but little happiness in store for the human race. Buckle says, "It is a bad condition where everybody believes, and no one doubts." To doubt is the beginning of many a person's happiness; for hell disappears as the doubts increase, the supernatural loses its hold acquired by early education, and the natural holds undisputed sway over the mind. Although the mind has been stunted and dwarfed during those years that priestcraft sat in judgment over it, yet what a fountain of happiness comes with the thought and the feeling that I am free! Free to consider any subject and follow where reason leads—free to question all things, whether related to the creature or creator. To the person of thought that feeling brings more satisfaction than anything else can, for it includes all else. Is there any doubt of it? Let those who hav outgrown their early and gloomy religious education, or they who, by a change of surroundings, hav broken their bonds and stepped into the arena of freedom of thought, giv an answer. But why ask such a question, when their very countenances show an advance in intellectual knowledge, without which humanity would be a blank. Political events often keep the people back—intellectual events urge them forward. Rev. James Fraser, a Scotch Presbyterian, said, "The world is a dangerous thing and a great evil, and the comforts of it a hell." What superstition!

> "Yes, superstition is the people's curse,
> That strips the flock to cram the parson's purse;
> When called religion it cajoles the weak,
> Who then, from fear of hell, the parson seek;
> To Mumbo-Jumbo, or grim Juggernaut,
> Or Bennamuckee, just as they are taught,
> To Moses, or Mohammed, or to Christ
> By superstition one and all enticed."

Away with it! The only antidote is knowledge. Try all things by your reason; and the comforts of this world, instead of being a hell, are found to be the one thing needful. Comforts are not extravagances. People all over the country fail to obtain them. Their possession depends upon no point of the compass, nor no particular degree of temperature of the climate—but mainly on what is inherent in us, in proportion as we increase or diminish this power by a system of living that wastes or saves. There is no other name given whereby you can be saved—only by saving. Save your hard earnings from swelling the coffers of those who preach a gospel that says, "Blessed be ye poor." Save your earnings from those who tempt you with intoxicating drinks—save it from going into the maelstrom of fashion and pride. Save yourself from poverty and all the ills that follow in its train, and save yourselvs from following those whose only regard for you will vanish as certainly as your day's work will fail, or by reason of failure, sickness, and too many other causes to enumerate.

CHARLES C. JOHNSON.

Milford, Mass.

An Open Letter to Mr. Hogeland.

From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

SIR: Looking over your book entitled "Ten Years Among Newsboys," I was greatly surprised and shocked in reading a chapter up on "Infidels," in which they were classed with the worst type of criminals. It is evident you are either ignorant of the meaning of the word "Infidel" or guilty of an unnecessary slander. If the former (which I trust is the case), your first duty is to inform yourself. If the latter, you are no person to hav the guidance of children.

An Infidel is one who does not believe in the inspiration of the scriptures, or the divine origin of Christ. If you will take the time to reflect, you must admit this to be the broadest and most complete meaning of the word. Now, sir, whom do you find among this class? Are they the criminals of this or any other so-called Christian country? Go into our prisons, where and when you will, seek out the most depraved—are they believers or unbelievers? I will guarantee that 90 per cent are believers, that they would make oath to believing in Bible, Christ, God, devil, hell and heaven, and would fight the man who would call them Infidels. As a proof of my statement I refer you to the report of prisons in Great Britain for the year 1873, under the direction of Sir John Trelawney. The following are the exact figures as reported:

Roman Catholics	33,381
Church of England	93,097
Jews	757
Protestant Dissenters	10,705
Non-religionists	279
Total	145,918

Or about 500 Christians to one Infidel.

The prominent champions of Infidelity in the world to-day are men of the purest and highest type, morally and intellectually. I name a few of those you hav classed with the assassins and libertins: Prof. Tyndall, Prof. Huxley, Herbert Spencer, Chas. Darwin, Sir Chas. Lyell, Humboldt, Prof. Alex. Agassiz, John Stuart Mill, Chas. Dickens, Gerritt Smith, Wendell Phillips, Lloyd Garrison, Carl Schurz, Chas. Sumner, and Theodore Parker, Chas. Bradlaugh, Prof. Buchner, Anthony Trollope, Prof. Wallace, Prof. Young, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Prof. Richard Proctor, Robt. G. Ingersoll, Prof. Youmans, Oliver W. Holmes, J. G. Saxe, and H. W. Longfellow. It is possible you may not hav heard of these persons, but I can assure you the names given are of persons, many of whom are now alive, and bearing a good reputation for truth and veracity in the community in which they liv.

Among those whom you class as next to the assassin, etc., may be named the following St. Louis gentleman, than whom none are more earnest in the welfare of the poor, or more generous in gifts to the homeless and suffering: Mr. Carl Daenzer, editor Anzeiger; E. Preetorius, editor Westliche Post; Jos. McCullough, editor Globe Democrat; Wm. Hyde, editor Missouri Republican; Thos. Dimmock and Thomas Garrett, editorial writers, Republican; Prof. Woodward of Washington University, Prof. Nipher of Washington University. Judge Seymour D. Thompson, Court of Appeals; Prof. W. G. Harris, ex-Superintendent of Public Schools and hundreds of the best and noblest men in the city.

Among men of this nation devoting their lives for the benefit of the ignorant and poor, let me ask whose name shines brighter than Infidel Felix Adler of New York? And among men of wealth, who has done more for education and practical charity than Infidel Peter Cooper?

As an Infidel, I hav the highest admiration and respect for the truly noble Christian people who hav done and are doing all in their power to feed and clothe the poor, and care for the little homeless orphans; but it is their duty to do so. Their "church has made more orphans than it will ever take care of," it has taken more dollars from the poor than it ever will repay.

I respectfully ask you to read the above carefully. If you think that you hav not said something uncalled for, stated something which is not true, and unjustly slandered those whom the best element in the world respects, I will hav more contempt for your narrow-minded bigotry than I could ever hav admiration for your efforts in behalf of newsboys.

J. A. ST. JOHN.

Sunbeams Shining Through the Church.

From Peck's Sun.

The religious element in some men is so strong that it will terribly strain some other equally desirable trait. A colored man of Kentucky recently stole a mule "to ride to church." It is not known how much farther he would hav ridden had he been unable to find a customer for the mule after the service was over.

Last week the big boss of the Mormon church, John Taylor, celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday by holding a general muster of his numerous wife, and calling the roll. Some of his first wife had to hav an introduction to her husband in order to be able to enjoy the festivities. The young and good-looking ones were all solid with the old man.

As expected, Jake Nelling, the murderer of Ada Atkinson, in Indiana, is "getting religion." It is remarkable how soon after committing the wickedest of crimes a man gets an attack of biliousness, or is just insane enough to employ the best attorneys in the state. A prospect of an interview with a rope with a slip-noose in the end has a wonderful influence in certain directions.

A Chicago minister, in preaching a sermon on Martin Luther, said it was generally admitted that Luther was in the habit, in early life, of sitting in taverns, drinking beer and singing songs until late into the night! It is charitable to suppose that Martin sung hymns and drank small beer. If a disciple of Luther should go to the saloons nights and act that way now-days, he would get pulled by the police and churched by the church. It is different now.

This is the season of the year that the truly good parents go to church after locking their children in the house so that they can't escape, and return to find the home and children cremated while they were praying for the light of intelligence to illuminate the heathen mind. Judging from five children-locked-in-the-house-and-burnt cases during the past week, a little of that light for the benefit of heathens could be used to advantage for illuminating purposes in some places in Christian lands.

One cannot be too careful where they shout "Amen" during a prayer. Near New Orleans on Wednesday last two men were seriously, and a third slightly injured over an "Amen" dispute. It appears that while one man was praying at a meeting on the Sunday previous one of the men shouted "Amen" at a place in the prayer the praying man thought out of place, and in discussing it they went from words to blows to prove their arguments. The only sure way to get in the "Amen" in good shape and the right place is to shout, "Amen, hit or miss!" This will save all discussions or demonstrations as to its being stuck in in the right place.

A Brooklyn preacher has preached a sermon, the object of which was to account for the scarcity of young people at Sunday evening meetings, and the opinion was freely expressed that the cause of the absence lay in the practice of courting on Sunday evening. The minister denounced the practice as wrong, and calculated to do great injury to the church. And yet it is safe to say that the minister, when he was young, did his courting on Sunday evening. It is the only evening that everything seems to conspire to make courting easy. The city is quiet, the old folks go to bed early, and all nature seems to do her best to giv the young people a good send-off. There are lodges, and theaters, and other places that must be visited on week-day nights, and a girl is not at her best on any night but Sunday, they tell us. The Brooklyn preacher had better confine himself to the doctrins, and let courting alone as a text for a discourse.

Paine's Birthday at Louisville.

The Liberals of Louisville, Ind., and vicinity, will celebrate the next anniversary of Thomas Paine's birthday, at the hall of the German Gymnastic Association, Jefferson street, between Preston and Jackson, either on the Sunday preceding the 29th of January, or the Sunday following. I hav undertaken the responsibility for all expenses, such as printing, advertising, and the pay of the orator of the day, music, etc. In connection with the lecture by B. F. Underwood, we will probably hav social enjoyment, music, and dancing for all who feel so inclined. We hope to hav all Liberals within reach in attendance on the day, and all who feel interested in giving as respectable and enthusiastic demonstration in favor of Freethought and in commemoration of the illustrious patriot and author are requested to address the undersigned for tickets at fifty cents each, and to send the names of such persons as will be interested.

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.—Continued.

The Internal Evidence.—When the lack of all evidence of the genuinness or credibility of the New Testament is clearly proved by admissions of the best accredited Christian historians, we are told with a profound, solemn, Bunsby-like wisdom—that would be amusing were less important interests involved—"The internal evidence is quite sufficient to convince any person, able to read, of the truth, genuinness, and divine inspiration of the New Testament." And then too, the Holy Ghost "will always illume, and bring to a full knowledge of the truth, any who will study its sacred pages.

These assertions are so often reiterated that they are generally taken for granted as true. Yet it is well known that no two believers, however sincere and devout, ever arrived at exactly the same conclusion; but invariably differ, just as their temperament, training, and denominational preferences prompt; and despite their claim to reverence the mandate, "Love one another," prove just as vindictiv and fierce in their denunciations and persecution of all who differ with them as if there were no such thing as a Holy Ghost in existence.

But that space in THE TRUTH SEEKER is too valuable to permit, we could giv extracts from various eminent Christians—all of whom were sincerely and conscientiously desirous to establish the truth—denying and repudiating the various points of faith, so that, collectivly, every essential doctrin held by orthodox Christians is denied or repudiated, and that too by most esteemed advocates of New Testament sacredness.

The Jews and Christians are not the only people that hav made Bibles. Many other peoples and nations hav their inspired word of God; many of them much more ancient, reasonable, and consistent, with fully as good or better evidence of their divine inspiration, and of much purer morality.

Nearly all nations hav had their separate gods, their sacred imposed writings, their prophets, priests, and divine commands.

How can we know they are all false, unless we examin and compare? Are the children of Abraham better, more pure? Are Christians more studious and humble in the pursuit of knowledge? Do they liv more useful, more benevolent, or happier lives than all others, that we are constrained to believe their sacred writing embody all that is divine and good?

The Jewish theology on which Christianity is founded is no more the oldest in the world than it is the purest, most ennobling, or best.

Far, far be it from us to wish to wound the feelings or arouse the prejudice of any sincere and honest believers in the Bible. We appeal to them in all love and candor. Is it not perfectly right and proper to thoroughly examin into the truthfulness and claims to divine inspiration of the Bible?

If it is, as is claimed, really and truly the word of God, given by him for the express purpose of saving souls from the pangs and tortures of eternal hell, shall we not greatly help the cause of Christianity and humanity by our investigation?

Truth, the more thoroughly investigated, shines the brighter. Error alone dreads and opposes examination.

We hav had it instilled into us from earliest childhood that the Bible is the word of God, a direct emanation from our father in heaven, every word inspired and given to teach us God's plan of salvation.

Naturally we cling to the ideas of our childhood, that the Bible contains truths and moral precepts far superior to all other books. If this is really so, then the more we read, examin, and compare its declarations with reason, truth, and science, the brighter and clearer will its claims to our veneration become.

Let us then calmly and dispassionately examin the "internal evidence."

Jesus promised, "Howbeit when he, the spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth" (John xvi, 13).

This very holy spirit, called the "Comforter," thus far has failed to appear. We now most respectfully invite him to do his duty, and let his holy light illume us in our search for truth, without further solicitation.

But as in over eighteen hundred years he does not appear to hav once found conditions favorable, we had better not wait his manifestation, but proceed to carefully examin the "internal evidence."

The books which compose the New Testament were first circulated at a time when the critical spirit was non-existent, and when true believers accounted all forgeries in favor of their religion, not only permissible but praiseworthy; hence the amount of falsification is absolutely appalling.

When attention is called to the glaring contradictions and falsifications, we are met with the assurance, "Oh, never mind all that; there is enough we can understand, without troubling ourselvs with the divine mysteries. We must accept the good we can understand, and let the rest go."

But is it not self-evident truth that, if the New Testament writers were inspired of God, they could not help but agree with each other, even in the most minute particular? But, beyond all question, when recording the most incredible and astounding incidents ever conceived, contrary to all known or natural laws—events of such momentous import to the whole human race, belief or rejection of which affect the present and eternal destiny, not alone of all who hav ever lived, but of countless millions yet unborn; when belief results in everlasting life in happiness, and rejection, or lack of faith, insures everlasting tortures in the sulphurous flames of hell—surely we are justified in expecting the most clear, positiv, indisputable evidence, and the most exact and perfect accord in the testimony of all the witnesses, so that there could be no reasonable room for doubt.

The whole fabric of Christianity, it is admitted, depends upon the truth and divine inspiration of the four gospels, which purport to giv a full account of the birth, life, teachings, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ.

Matthew commences his gospel with the declaration that it is "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ" (Matt. i, 1).

The very first line of the New Testament is a self-evident misstatement of facts, for it is not a book of the generation of Jesus Christ, but of Joseph, who, it is insisted on, was not the father of Jesus, for he knew not Mary until after Christ was born. "And knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born son, and called his name Jesus" (Matt. i, 25). Luke differs greatly from Matthew; and worse yet, there is a total discrepancy between both Matthew and Luke and the Old Testament (see 1 Chron. iii, 19–24).

Of seven sons of Zerubbabel, not one bears the name, or anything like the name, Rhesa or Abind, and of the next generation not one bears the name of anything like Eliakim or Joanna.

Matthew says there were but forty-two generations—fourteen from Abraham to David, fourteen from David until the carrying-away into Babylon, and fourteen from that time to Christ.

Luke declares there were fifty-six. Such, at the outset, is the internal evidence of New Testament truth and divine inspiration.

It is claimed by some that the discrepancies between Matthew and Luke are because one givs the genealogy of Joseph, the supposed father, and the other of Mary, the mother of Jesus.

But this is flatly contradicted by the "internal evidence." "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age, being [as was supposed] the son of Joseph, which was the son of Heli, which was the son of Matthat," etc. (Luke iii, 23, 28).

Leaving these most useless, contradictory genealogies of Joseph, which, independent of discrepancies, giv proof of the lack of either inspiration or divine wisdom, being of no possible interest or profit, since they do not at all relate to Christ, we come to the birth of Christ. This is the all-important event on which the whole claim of Christianity depends, and we are again and again assured that the birth of Christ in all things was in exact fulfilment of the prophecies of the Old Testament.

Matthew was a publican, or tax-gatherer, and knew nothing of Christ until called to follow him and become his disciple, A.D. 31, or, according to Luke, when Christ was about thirty years old. Yet he givs us all the particulars—tells us just what Joseph thought, as well as what Joseph dreamed.

"Now, the birth of Jesus Christ was on this wise: When as his mother, Mary, was espoused to Joseph, before they came together, she was found with child of the Holy Ghost.

"Then Joseph, her husband, being a just man, and not willing to make her a public example, was minded to put her away privily.

"But while he thought on these things, behold the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a dream, saying, Joseph, thou son of David, fear not to take unto thee Mary, thy wife, for that which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost" (Matt. i, 18–20).

The evidence of Matthew is: Joseph discovering the condition of his wife Mary, decided to put her away; while worrying over it, he dreamed his wife, although with child, was nevertheless a virgin; and this dream rendered Joseph perfectly content. We hav no record; no claim is made that Joseph ever told Matthew anything about this queer dream, yet it is alleged that somewhere between thirty and sixty years after, Matthew givs us this astounding revelation. Which, it is most solemnly asserted, we must believe or be damned.

Was Matthew divinely inspired? If so, why did he evince doubts of his story being accepted? Why seek to bolster up the account by quoting and grossly perverting prophecy of Old Testament.

He cites to us a prophecy which the divine inspirer, as well as Matthew, knew had no reference or any possible connection or application to the birth of Christ.

Now all this was done that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken of the Lord by the prophets, saying, "Behold, a virgin shall be with child, and shall bring forth a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel" (Matt. i, 22, 23). This is a quotation from Isa. vii, 14. What are the facts? In the early part of the reign of Ahaz, the kingdom of Judah was threatened with annihilation by the combined armies of Syria and Israel.

The prophet Isaiah comes to King Ahaz with a message of hope and consolation, prophesying not only that the designs of the hostil armies should fail, but within the sixty-five years the kingdom of Israel would be overthrown. For confirmation of his word, the prophet bids Ahaz ask a sign of God, which the king refused to do.

Isaiah then announces a sign God would giv Ahaz unasked. "Therefore the Lord himself shall giv you a sign, Behold a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings" (Isa. vii, 14–16).

1st. The sign given was only to King Ahaz, and could not possibly, in any way, refer to Christ, who was not born until seven hundred and twenty-six years after Ahaz's death.

2d. The virgin shall call his name "Immanuel." But Mary never called her first born Immanuel, nor did anyone else. "And when the eight days were accomplished, for the circumcising of the child, his name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb" (Luke ii, 21).

3d. The child should be born, but before he should arrive at years of discretion, the prophet announces the land shall be desolate whose kings threatened Ahaz.

Had Matthew quoted the context instead of only a piece of a verse, it would hav been self-evident to all that it could hav no possible reference to Christ.

Such gross perversion of scripture as Matthew is guilty of to sustain his most improbable story, is indeed internal evidence that, not even with help from a Holy Ghost, would convince the reader either of the infallibility or divine inspiration of such an author.

"Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea in the days of Herod the king, behold, there came wise men from the East to Jerusalem, saying, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? for we hav seen his star in the east, and are come to worship him. When Herod the king had heard these things, he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him. And when he had gathered all the chief priests and scribes of the people together, he demanded of them where Christ should be born" (Matt. ii, 1–4).

The Herods were Jews in faith. It is very strange the king and all the city should be troubled; they would much more likely hav rejoiced at the birth of the Messiah, who, it is claimed, they were then expecting. The general policy of the whole Herodian family centered in the endeavor to found a great and independent kingdom in which the power of Judaism should subserve to the consolidation of a state.

The answer of the scribes is much more like the answer of Matthew, who invariably drags in Old Testament prophecy to uphold his assertions. "And they said unto him in Bethlehem of Judea: for thus it is written by the prophets. And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda, for out of thee shall come a governor that shall rule my people Israel" (Math. ii, 5, 6).

The prophecy here quoted (Micah. v, 2), merely promises that there shall come out of Bethlehem Ephratah one who shall deliver the Jews from the Assyrians when they invade Judea, and shall retaliate by wasting the land of Assyria with the sword. This is clearly proved by the context.

"And they shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and the land of Nimrod in the entrances thereof. Thus shall he deliver us from the Assyrian when he cometh into our land, and when he treadeth within our borders" (Micah. v, 6).

Did Christ deliver the Jews from the invading Assyrians? Did Christ lay Assyria and Babylon waste with the sword?

"When they had heard the king they departed; and lo, the star which they saw in the east went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was" (Matt. ii, 9).

What an extraordinary star, to stand over one particular house in a village! And what extraordinary wise men, to be able to tell which house in a village the star stood over!

"And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary, his mother" (Matt. i, 11).

How very often we hav heard of Jesus being born in a manger! Why, it is one of the most often repeated assertions connected with Christ. But when we come to examin the authority for the statement, it is like Washington cutting the cherry-tree, or William Tell shooting the apple from the head of his young son—only a legend. Matthew does not say a word about any manger, nor Mark, nor John.

"And being warned of God in a dream that they should not return to Herod, they departed into their own country another way.

"And when they were departed, behold, the angel of the Lord appeareth to Joseph in a dream, saying, Arise, and take the young child and his mother and flee into Egypt, and be thou there until I bring thee word; for Herod will seek the young child to kill him.

"When he arose he took the young child and his mother, by night, and departed into Egypt, and was there until the death of Herod" (Mat. ii, 12–14).

There seems to be a deal of dreaming in regard to this record of the birth of Christ. The question naturally arises, Did not Matthew himself dream the whole story?

In the language of Matthew, "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets."

"I hav heard what the prophets said, that prophecy lies in my name, saying, I hav dreamed, I hav dreamed.

"How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophecy lies? yea they are prophets of the deceit of their own hearts" (Jer. xxiii, 25, 26).

Does not this very much better apply to Matthew than any quotation Matthew has applied to Christ?

Matthew declares immediately after the departure of the wise men, Joseph, Mary, and the child fled nto Egypt in fear of Herod, who sought the child's life.

"When he arose he took the young child and his mother, by night, and departed into Egypt."

We might believe this, but Matthew resorts again to perversion of Old Testament prophecy to sustain his assertion.—(To be Continued.)

Fruits of Land Robbery.

In my article on "Land Thieves," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 10th ult., I told you something about the quantity of land that our robberment, falsely called government, had stolen from the homeless people that needed it to raise food on, and hav just as good a right to it as they hav to sunlight or life itself. And now I propose to say something of the effects of this dreadful and outrageous robbery.

I hav just read that one railroad company has stretched a three-ply barbed-wire fence alongside of its tract stolen from the people, and given to it, forty miles, and emigrants seeking homes, and other travelers, hav to travel around this fence. If they come to the middle of it, they must travel twenty miles to get around the end of it, and back twenty miles, making forty miles travel to get ahead on their journey one inch. Think of the extra travel that will be necessary when all the 180,000,000 acres given to the railroads, and the hundreds of millions stolen and sold to English and French (ig)noblemen, and lying in different tracts, are fenced in!

I hav also just met with the following in the Portland, Me., Press:

"LAND SWINDLES.

"BISMARCK, DAKOTA, Nov. 13th.—Within a few days legal steps will be taken against a firm of Englishmen, Nelson & Hughes, who hav been in conspiracy to obtain government lands near here. Their scheme has been to hire men to settle upon quarter sections for six months for a small sum, and then for $1.25 an acre paid the government obtain a full title. In this way the ownership of several thousand acres has been acquired. The witnesses to this plot are at hand in the persons of some of the men who were thus employed to make fictitious settlements, and the land office expects to make an example which will hav an effect upon this fraudulent taking up of government land. It is going on in all the territories, but more particularly in Dakota. In many cases these operations are conducted with the connivance of government officers. So flagrant are the offenses that Commissioner McFarland recommends Congress to change the pre-emption land law, so that an actual settlement of two years, instead of six months, will be necessary. In most cases no further action is taken than ejectment, but certain English parties, with capital behind them, hav so unblushingly evaded and defied our laws that something more stringent must be done."

If any criminals ought ever to be hung by their necks till they are dead, these men ought to be, for they are causing starvation and death to future generations, which is as bad as downright, deliberate murder.

In Ireland, between thirty and forty years ago, thousands of people lay down and died of starvation. They had no money to buy food, and could get no work to do, and were just as helpless as though they were locked up in prison and left to starve. In that very year there had been food enough raised in Ireland to supply all their wants, but the best of everything had been shipped to England to pay rents for land, that the rich nabobs and robbers had no more right to than they had to the lives and souls of the people; and when the potatoes, all that was left for the Irish toiler, were destroyed by the rot, starvation came, and thousands laid down and died, when if they had owned the land all would hav been comfortable. I remember I sent them $10 of my little store, and am now suffering for want of that money. Thousands, and tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of dollars in money and food were sent from here to Ireland that year, and yet they starved. I was told at the time that the Shakers, the only religious society that did not get red-hot mad with me sixty years ago, when I publicly declared, and proved by their own book, creed, and works, that the Protestant churches were the harlots that the church of Rome was the mother of, sent them two hundred barrels of flour. Thus you see that land robbery in Ireland has had its baleful effects even here, for all that was sent there was needed to make comfortable the widows, orphans, idiots, cripples, and the aged and infirm people in our own land, who had been worn out in half-paid toil for rich land-robbers. Nor is this the only effect that land-robbery in Ireland has had on this, but the pouring into our country every year of the lowest class of Irish people—thieves, murderers, and harlots—to fill our pauper-houses and prisons, and be supported by our toilers, is the fruit of land-robbery in Ireland; for if land had always been free to them they would never hav been the degraded creatures that they are.

I hav written this article, though in my eighty-third year, before three o'clock in the morning, because I hav not time by daylight to write all I want to, and I feel as earnest in this subject as though I were working to save a large city from the flames. The work is even greater than that. I am laboring to save a world from vice, crime, and starvation, hav been working in this cause nearly forty years, as the files of my old papers will prove, but most of the people appear to be asleep or like dead men on the subject, and probably will never awake to regain their right to land, and will leave their children in the flames.

A friend to landless toilers, Yours,

Berlin, N. J., Nov. 20, 1883. J. HACKER.

P. S.—I want every one who reads this to write and giv me all the information they can on the quantity of land given away and sold in large tracts. I want positiv, reliable facts, and nothing else. J. H.

Home Societies of Independent Truth Seekers.

We rejoice at the great good being accomplished by the Freethinkers' Association. The Rochester Convention did a grand work, in calling the attention of the people to the truth of Liberalism, and awakening a spirit of investigation. By no other means can this part of the work be so effectualy done. The convention at Salamanca will undoubtedly equal the Rochester meeting in good results—should and will exceed it, if all unite in earnest endeavor to awaken interest and insure attendance of intelligent friends and neighbors. We hope conventions will be held each month in different parts of the state; and as experience teaches wisdom, we confidently expect each will be far better, more helpful and successful than its predecessor.

The Liberal League and its subordinate Leagues are an acknowledged power wherever they exist. We wish each and all unbounded success, increase of numbers, power, and usefulness. They each hav their mission. But they do not reach all our home wants. We need independent, educational, periodical, and social societies, so that wherever there are few or many Liberals, no matter for their diversity of opinion on other points, all can unite in a home association of Independent Truth Seekers, and not be the less earnest and energetic in any other Liberal organizations of which are or should be members.

Winter is upon us. This is the season of revivals and strenuous efforts on the part of the churches to inveigle people into adoption of their creeds and superstitions. What can we do for our own and our children's advancement; for the deliverance of our friends and neighbors from the shackles of superstition and the power of priestcraft? Whatever is decided to be done, must be done quickly. It is useless to wait for grand efforts, with the hope of reaching perfection at the outset. Let us do the best we can and begin now, and we may hope to continue improving until we do reach our ideal.

Christians are giving freely of their time and money, circulating their denominational papers, tracts, and books, and professional revivalists to propagate their superstitious dogmas. Shall not we, as Liberals, do as much in behalf of truth, science, and mental liberty?

We present a platform for consideration, on which it would seem all Liberals, of whatever shade of opinion, can cheerfully and heartily unite.

PLATFORM.

"Believing in strictly secular government, and equal rights for all, we earnestly desire that Liberality, science, and truth, shall take the place of bigotry, credulity, and superstition.

"Recognizing the question, 'What is truth?' with its living issues, as the keynote to human progress, and a perpetual incentiv to investigation—

"We as Liberals, for the purpose of promoting scientific education, truth, and sociability, hereby join together in forming what shall be known as the "———— society of Independent Truth Seekers."

"Our aims and objects are more efficient work in behalf of Freethought, equal rights to all, a true responsible liberty, and advancement in all that pertains to truth, right-living, and useful knowledge; the elevation of moral, social, and intellectual standards, the systematic circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal and scientific periodicals, books, pamphlets, and tracts; providing rational amusements, and affording mutual aid in attaining the highest mental, physical, and moral conditions.

"Leaving all free to the enjoyment of their own views or philosophy in regard to all questions concerning other worlds, and other states of being, we regard it as of primary importance to promote human progress and happiness here and now, as our best contribution to the cause of human advancement in the future."

In hundreds of places there are from five to five hundred Liberals, and yet no organization, no united effort, no social or educational advantages, nothing being done for the children, who are left exposed to the snares and wiles of the adversary.

We all deplore this. Who will make effort to remedy it? Who will lay aside hobby and ism and organize a society of Liberals in their own neigborhood? Call on Liberal friends, talk over the platform and the necessity of such an organization, invite them to meet at your house. All can at least unite in more systematic distribution of our periodicals. Discuss the most effectual means to interest and induce friends and neighbors to read and subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Hold meetings every week to report, compare notes, and tell incidents and experiences in canvassing.

Form a science-school class for the children, select lessons in natural philosophy, physiology, phrenology, hygiene, or any subject preferred. But be sure to make the lessons bright, cheerful, interesting, and instructiv. Let it be the first duty of every adult to giv his or her best efforts to this end. After class, let each make three to five minute speeches on the subject of the lesson, not with the idea of showing how smart they are, not to raise objections and excel in knock-over arguments of those preceding them, but in a loving spirit of emulation, as genuin truth seekers desirous of imparting and receiving instruction.

All can unite in this, and soon a strong society of Independent Truth Seekers would result, that would be a source of delight and help to its members, of pleasure and instruction to the children, and a power of good in the community.

In the language of the model truth seeker, the revered and lamented D. M. Bennett, "who, being dead, yet speaketh:"

"Then let us hold up our heads, let us hav backbone, let us not be ashamed to avow the truth we hav found, nor to let our light shine into dark places. Let us interest ourselvs in the enlightenment of others; let us call the attention of inquiring minds to the arguments of reason in Liberal publications; let us circulate the organs of Freethought; let us be zealous and activ in the work, and in due time our ranks will be greatly enlarged, the army of free men and free women will be vastly increased, until finally truth will everywhere prevail, and the great preponderance of the world will be Liberal."

Rochester, N. Y. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

IF the clergy were not sure, by reason of their holy calling, of going to heaven, we should begin to feel uneasy for some of them. Here we see the Rev. Mr. Brophy, of the Ribbon army, being fined, for getting drunk, and the Rev. Edward Rose (known in the Looard as "happy Jack") getting eighteen months for being giddy. It was only the other day, too, that an Anglican vicar in New Zealand was kicked out by the church-wardens for certain ministrations in connection with a member of his choir that are not embodied in the ritual of the church of England; and daily accounts reach us of the conduct of certain reverend gentlemen which is decidedly more skittish than sedate. These circumstances, however, receive but little notice at our hands, and it is only when a reverend martyr writes us from "the jug" and asks us to fling him some tobacco over the wall that we begin to think there is something in it. The gentleman with whom we hav to deal now is noticed, not so much because of his alleged roguery, as because of his sublime audacity; and less because of either than on account of the gorgeous vein of humor, polished and delicate in its every phase, that he displayed in the transaction we are going to chronicle. It seemed that one Bayley, living in Essex, lost by a misfortune the two horses by means of which he was enabled to gain a livelihood, and a subscription, headed by the vicar, the Rev. B. Ruck-Keene, was initiated, which closed at £9, an amount sufficient to enable Bayley to buy a new horse with. "Then," says the Essex Telegraph, "the reverend gentleman, with this money in his hand, went to Mr. Bayley's, and in that individual's absence, arranged with Mrs. Bayley that £7 of this money should be deducted for tithes due, and thus by a clever coup the Rev. Ruck-Keene is £4 10s. in pocket." The Rev. Mr. Ruck-Keene, on the Sunday following, of course mounted the pulpit in a clean white surplice and read the service impressivly; then, after sending the sexton to the vicarage from the vestry to see how the roast pork was getting on, donned his vestments, and "got at them" again, entreating his hearers to be pure of mind, unselfish, God-fearing, and charitable. That's the way they do it. Well, there appears to all but Pastor Allen to be a dim uncertainty hanging over the question of our eventual destination. So all we can say, wherever the place may be, if the Rev. Mr. Ruck-Keene has a seat in the dress-circle, we shall humbly beg to be put into the pit—yes, gentlemen, the bottomless pit.—Melbourne Bulletin.

The Basis of Modern Infidelity.

Under this caption the New York Sun says:

"Mr. Robert S. Ball, the Astronomer Royal of Ireland, writing in Longman's Magazine, speaks of the 'wondrous change' which has taken place in educated opinion concerning the Darwinian theory.

"When the 'Origin of Species' was first published, in 1859, the doctrin of natural selection was 'received with an outburst of incredulity;' but less than a quarter of a century after 'the whole nation with one accord demanded that Mr. Darwin's remains should be interred in the national mausoleum.' His funeral at Westminster Abbey, says Mr. Ball, 'must be regarded as marking a momentous epoch in the history of thought.'

"The most remarkable change effected by that theory, so far as the general thought is concerned, has been in men's attitude toward theology. The quarter of a century since the publication of the 'Origin of Species' has been a period of extraordinary religious revolution. Theology has not been attacked, as in the past, at particular points, but has been thrown overboard altogether by a great proportion of educated men. They reject it as much as they do the old mythologies, or class it with them in their minds. ey do not assail it, but rather ignore it in their thinking.

"The religious Infidelity which has spread so rapidly of late years is, therefore, radically different from that of the past, and it is more dangerous to the church than any it has had to meet since its foundation. The new Infidelity resists argument, for it utterly rejects the premises of theology. There is no use of quoting the Bible to it, for it denies revelation. It has no respect for the authority of the church, because it holds that the church was founded on a delusion; and the supernatural explanations and assumptions of theology are based on impossibility, according to its theory.

"The civilized world is becoming more and more sharply divided into two great classes of minds, the believers and the Agnostics, and the theories on which they proceed are so radically opposed that we see no possibility of any agreement between them. One or the other must prevail; but can there be any question that religion will finally hav the upper hand?"

That is a very clear statement of the case, and does credit to the acumen of our contemporary. The concluding query, "Can there be any question that religion will finally hav the upper hand?" must be answered, Yes or No, according to the views as to what constitutes religion held by the jury to which it is submitted. If by religion the Sun means Christianity, with its unreasonable premises and illogical conclusions, its dogma that all men are sinners, and can only be saved from a burning hell through belief in Christ, its childish creation story, and equally absurd fall of man and redemption by the crucifixion of the aforesaid Christ, then the question will assuredly be answered with, Yes. But if the Sun means by religion the sentiment of love which binds man to man, that sentiment that in all ages and in all climes, by the follows of Confucius, Buddha, Mohammed, and Christ, has built hospitals for the sick, schools for the ignorant, homes for the poor, then the answer is, No. Giv the Agnostics, between whom and Christianity there is so wide a gulf, the wealth and power of the church, let them practically rule the world for fifteen hundred years, and we venture to prophesy that true religion (if it is advisable to use a word that has been so abused) would be so firmly fixed in the hearts of the world as to be beyond question. But true religion is not a theological religion. True religion is love, generosity, helpfulness. This earth its heaven; sorrow is its hell; effort its savior. No iconoclasts will attack such a religion.

Of course, Christianity can hav no part and lot in such a religion. Christianity is a belief in certain written dogmas, points of faith, assertions as to the origin of all things. These are all inextricably entangled, woven together, and Christianity stands or falls as the truth or falsity of these dogmas and assertions is proven. Christianity is an affirmation, and logically its assertions must be proved by its adherents. That this has not been done in fifteen hundred years is good enough evidence that such proof is impossible.

But without regard to what the church has asserted, and still asserts, science has patiently dug into the earth and dredged the sea for information as to the origin of our planet and the animal life found on it. The labors of Darwin are the most voluminous chapter in that history. A student and expounder of evolution finds no corner in that science in which to fit the bib and rattle tale of Moses. The leaders in the new science ignore Genesis as completely as they ignore its Indian counterpart, the story of Adami and Heva. The scientific explanation of the world is the opposit of the theological explanation. If the scientific view is accepted the theological view must go. This is the basis of modern Infidelity, or rather one of the bases, and really the most powerful one. Infidelity does not seek to attain a negativ result alone. It answers theology by substituting a true cosmogony for the Christian false one. Evolution recognizes theology as a phase through which all peoples pass. All nations hav been superstitious, and created gods to rule over them. Christianity is but ancient superstition changed to suit the needs of the priesthood, and dragged down into our times. The patient toilers of science hav not time to smash the idols set up by superstitious sentiment. They do not seem to regard that work as of sufficient immportance, relying on the general laws of progress to effect the replacement of the old dogmatisms by the new discoveries. But evolution furnishes a complete, absolute, and perfect overthrow of Christianity, and if by religion the Sun means the current system, the answer is that as the false cannot stand, religion will be lost. "As for truth, it is always strong; it liveth and conquereth forevermore."

A Scramble of Clergymen.

The contest between Cox, Carlisle, and Randall, for the speakership of the next House of Congress, is not the only fight there is in Washington for office. The Speaker is a necessary officer of Congress, however, and the aspiration to the office is an honorable ambition. But the twenty-seven applicants for the chaplaincy are suing for an office that is neither useful, ornamental, nor dignified. Neither is it an office in consonance with a democratic form of government, nor in harmony with the spirit of our institutions. As Washington said, our government is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion. A very large number of the citizens of the United States do not believe at all in churches or Christianity. A still larger number regard prayer as an entirely useless ceremony. Yet the churches hav imposed upon nearly every legislativ body in the land a man whose duty it is to rise every morning and go through the mummery of preaching at the roof of the legislativ hall, often embodying in the speech the particular views of the speaker as to legislation likely to be acted upon that day. This is a species of lobbying that even the "third house" would hardly hav the impudence to inaugurate. For his precious services, the chaplain of the House receives nine hundred dollars per session, and the chaplain of the Senate as much more, making one thousand eight hundred dollars subsidy to the church, paid by the people every session of Congress. In times past, the chaplains hav also been accused of receiving money for their influence upon individual legislators, and of earning their money, too.

The custom of hiring hypocrits to tell the Lord how he should proceed is one handed down from kingdoms and empires, where the occupant of the throne is too lazy or too ignorant to exercise the divinity part of himself, and must needs keep a court minister as he keeps a court clown. As the United States took common law from England, as our courts now consult English precedents, so the Puritans took this custom. In Massachusetts, in witchcraft days, the magistrate was often the minister. These offices hav since been separated, and the minister is, in law, only a private citizen, but, like a leech, he has fastened upon our legislativ bodies, determined that the church shall be somehow recognized in our government.

It is the duty of every American citizen to protest against this practical uniting of church and state. The government has nothing to do with religion, and should keep its functions distinct from and unsoiled by sectarianism. It is an outrage to force upon the Congress of the United States a praying puppet, who every morning insults the large body of Freethinkers and Agnostics in this county. The twenty-seven preachers who are scrambling for the chance to do this, will do well to bear in mind the fact that they are not respected by the men before whom they practice their mental gymnastics, are regarded with contempt by a large part of the population of Washington, and are considered impudent upstarts by millions of the people, who help pay them for performing worse than useless services. When the world was ignorant, their calling was considered elevated. The efforts of just such pulpit politicians as these twenty-seven hav helped immensely to make it contemptible.

Forgetting Our Heroes.

Last Sunday was the 100th anniversary of the evacuation of the British troops from New York, and last Monday the event was celebrated by the most pompous ceremonies New York city has ever seen. But in all the columns of gratulation printed, among all the revolutionary heroes honored, there was no mention of the one man to whom America owes so much—Thomas Paine. It was the same when the massiv structure called the Brooklyn bridge was opened. In the ceremonies of that occasion, graced like the present by the attendance of our national rulers, no mention was made of the inventor of iron bridges. No recollections of his great abilities and labor were called up by the orators who paid tribute to human enterprise on that occasion, and it remained for the Infidel papers and a solitary Unitarian minister to remind the country of the fact.

Paine's services in helping our revolutionary sires to drive the foreigner from our soil are well known to every student of the history of those times. The enormous value of his labor has been testified to by men like Jefferson and Washington. There is, there can be, no difference of opinion upon the subject. The sixteen numbers of the "Crisis" were worth more than many thousand men. His efforts in France in raising money for the struggling armies of colonies, and his work as secretary of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, were characterized by a whole-hearted devotion to the cause of independence which should gain for him the applause of every American, and make his name remembered as long as the nation endures.

But we see nothing of the kind. Because he was an Infidel he must be forgotten. Because he questioned revelation he must be execrated. Grand services count for nothing to the pulpit knaves and truckling politicians who spout platitudes on occasions of this kind, if the mighty laborer happen to hav denied Jesus Christ. And the people follow them and forget, too. Shame on the nation too cowardly to honor its heroes.

How splendidly shine Paine's words and works compared to Wesley's treacherous tory writings. The "Crisis" was a pillar of light cheering the colonists yn to victory. But John Wesley, the apostle of the most immoral sect of religious people in the civilized world, was a back-biting foe, and his writings a cloud of smoke that obscured the horizon of liberty. Wesley did nothing to secure the freedom his disciples enjoy, and make use of to defame a man whose weakest effort was of more worth than all of Wesley's life. To the Methodists, in great part, can be attributed the systematic suppression of the facts that redound to the glory of Paine, and the equally systematic spreading of venomous calumnies. We hope patriotic Americans, when next they hear the loud boasting of the Methodists, will read to them these words of John Wesley:

"As soon as I was convinced they (the Americans) sought independency, I knew that they were wrong."

"You profess yourselvs to be contending for liberty. But it is a vain, empty profession; unless you mean by that threadbare word, a liberty from obeying your rightful sovereign, and from keeping the fundamental laws of your country. And this undoubtedly it is which the Confederate colonies are now contending for."

And then read these of Paine:

"These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we hav this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph."

"He that rebels against reason is a real rebel; but he that in defense of reason rebels against tyranny, has a better title to 'Defender of the Faith' than George the Third."

"The sun never shone on a cause of greater worth. 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province, or a kingdom, but of a continent—of at least one-eighth part of the habitable globe. 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age; posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected, even to the end of time, by the proceedings now."

"Let the names of Whig and Tory be extinct; and let none other be heard among us than those of a good citizen; an open and resolute friend; and a virtuous supporter of the rights of mankind, and of the free and independent states of America."

Which is the more worthy of remembrance, the cringing priest or the glorious patriot? But the time will come, and that shortly, when in all our revolutionary celebrations the name of Paine will be linked with that of Washington, and all the miserable Methodists in the world will be powerless to prevent him being honored as he deserves.

A Truth Seeker Annual.

We are activly at work preparing a "Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884 (E.M. 284)," and shall hav it ready for mailing early this month.

It will contain a twelve-page calendar, recording the dates of the prominent events in Freethought history in Europe and America, a list of noted Freethinkers, with the dates of their births and deaths; a sketch of Freethought in this country; the history of the National Liberal League, with complete list of auxiliaries; a history of the New York State Freethinkers' Association; a paper on Freethought in Canada; the condition of Freethought in England, Australia, and on the continent; general information concerning the political parties in the United States; a list of the sacred books of history; different schools of philosophy; and a mass of other useful information.

We hav been aided in the preparation of the Annual by our friends Leland, Green, Mendum, Stevens, Watts, Putnam, Eckler, Bell, and others, and our readers can feel assured it will be a valuable manual for reference as well as an interesting work to read. Nothing of the kind has appeared in this country before, though much needed, and it fills a long felt want. We shall continue it every year, making each successiv issue more complete than the last, but the first one will necessarily be the most important, as the basis upon which the others are built.

Orders will be received now for the Annual and filled in the order of reception. Price, 25 cents.

Editorial Notes.

MR. ROBERT HENRY, the sexton of a Brooklyn church, has been found guilty of trying to defraud the pension department. Now that this good believer's dishonesty is proven, it would be interesting for his church to know whether he has always counted the money in the contribution box correctly.

A LUMBER-PILE fell over upon some workman in a yard in this city last Saturday, and two men were killed and two severely injured. If the Lord could hav been induced to watch that falling lumber-pile as closely as he is supposed to watch falling sparrows, two weeping widows might yet be smiling wives, with several children less depending on the charities of friends.

THE False Prophet of Soudan has just met the Egyptian troops and annihilated them. This prophet seems to be doing more fighting than prophesying. If he meets with no reverses, it will soon become unsafe in Egypt to speak of El Mahdi as the False Prophet. Just now he seems to be as worthy a successor of Mohammed as that warlike fanatic could hav desired.

A RELIGIOUS contemporary claims that nothing but Christianity can put an end to war and establish universal peace. As Christianity has caused more wars than anything else ever did, and has always made universal, or even local, peace impossible, this claim has the appearance of irony. Christianity might endure political peace, but religious peace it opposes in principle and practice.

MESSRS. WATTS AND CHAINEY will lecture at German Masonic Hall, 220 East Fifteenth street, this city, on the evening of Sunday, Dec. 9th. Tickets, at fifty cents each, are for sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. These gentlemen hav been doing valiant and efficient work throughout this country and in Canada, and, at the close of their lecturing tour, it is desirable to giv them a hearty reception in New York. We hope to see all our Liberal friends present on the 9th. An enjoyable evening is assured.

THE Independent thanks the Congregationalist "for its argument in defense of our New England fathers against the charge of killing Quakers." The Congregationalist (which the Independent refers to as "he") shows that "they did kill Quakers; but only those noisy public disturbers who refused to accept of banishment. The writer whom the Independent applauds would hav proved himself a better advocate if he had shown what right the Puritans had to banish Quakers, and why our "New England fathers" should themselvs hav escaped hanging for the crime of Quaker-killing. If they took the life of a Quaker for anything less than a capital offense, all the argument in the world cannot make them appear as anything but murderers. The religious world will continue to "revere their memory," though, all the same. Murder never yet stood in the way of a good Christian's admiration for true piety.

MR. WATTS held a debate on the 12th and 13th ult., at Toronto with a Rev. Mr. Brookman, on the subject, "Is Christianity of Divine Origin?" Of the debate and its conclusion the Toronto World says:

"A good many Christian gentlemen seemed to question Mr. Brookman's orthodoxy, and indeed the views he put forth would appear not be to those accepted by the leading Christian churches, nevertheless he undertook the task of speaking for them. Watts is a trained debater, of bulldog method, and thoroughly versed in the art of making the most of everything. The result, figurativly speaking, was that in the eyes of the audience he mopped the floor of the polemical arena with his mild antagonist. The audience of course was in the majority a Freethinking one, and made up reading of people. J. Ick Evans, as presiding officer, was in his element, and was armed with the historic bell wherewith he was won't in election days to call the political disputants to time in the old N. P. amphitheater."

We regret not having complete reports of the meetings, as the contest which ended so advantageously for Freethought excited wide interest, the audiences on both evenings being large.

"GATH," the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Inquirer, writes the following for that paper of the 15th:

"A few days ago Anthony Comstock went into the store of Monsieur Bonaventure, under the Astor House, and took away about eight hundred photographs of paintings from the present French Exhibition in Paris. He seized them on the ground that nobody has a right to sell them in New York, and that they were immoral. These are pictures which are used by our decorators for forms and suggestions to paint ceilings, for borders, and other decorations. In France, where there are thousands of fine models, the human form in its perfection is obtained, and France radiates these forms to the colder nations of the world. The same man seized two large copies of Cabarel's Venus, the painting made for the Empress Eugenie, and exhibited in the Paris Exhibition of 1867. M. Bonaventure is one of the most of refined buyers of books, paintings, missals, and rare things in this country. He is a Frenchman from Alsace, who came out here to be an engineer, and not knowing the language, lost a respectable fortune he brought here, and had to fall back upon his fine library for means. This he disposed of to such collectors as Joseph Drexel, A. Dupral, Robert Hoe, Jr., W. S. Andrews, H. P. Dubois, W. F. Sewell, and others. It then occurred to him that he might hav a career in facilitating library collectors. He spends about half the year in France. He arrived home the other day and found that in his absence his clerk, a mere boy, had been arrested, his shop depleted, and his name put into the newspapers by the ambition of an ignoramus to keep alive his unsavory trade. Stupidity of this sort is well adapted to again foment the manufacture and trade of really illicit things."

"Gath," who has been well known to the newspaper world for something like twenty-five years, and whose judgment is by some considered good, speaks of this affair as an "outrageous invasion of private rights," and of Comstock as a man who "voluntarily abandoned the pure pursuits of life to make a study of licentious literature;" and adds: "The anxiety of the man to keep himself before the public and still earn his salary has led him to make attempts to suppress any classical literature that did not suit his ignorant mind." Comstock is one of the worst nuisances that infest the public. The health commissioner are derelict in their duty unless they hav him carried to the dump, with the less offensiv garbage that is picked up around the city, and put forever out of sight and smell.

IN concluding a review of Renan's work on Marcus Aurelius, and the transformation of the antique world, M. W. Hazeltine says in last Sunday's Sun:

"Another cause has widely undermined in our day that religion which our ancestors professed with entire contentment. The rejection of the supernatural has become an absolute dogma for every cultivated mind. The history of the physical world and of the moral world now appears to us a process of development whose causes are internal, not external, and which therefore exclude miracles—that is to say, the intervention of deliberate individual volitions. Now, from the Christian point of view, the world's history is only a series of miracles. The creation, the story of the Jewish people, the role of Jesus, even when these hav been passed through the retort of the most liberal exegesis, leave a residuum of the supernatural that no operation of rationalistic chemics can extinguish or transform. The Semitic monotheistic religions are at bottom enemies of physical science, which to them seems a belittling and almost a denying of God. God did everything and still does everything; that is their key to the universe. Christianity, though it has by no means carried this dogma to the same exaggerations as has Islam, postulates revelation, that is to say a miracle, or one of those alleged facts that science has never seen established. Between Christianity and science, therefore, warfare is inevitable; one of the two adversaries must succumb. From the thirteenth century, the moment when, by reason of the study of the books of Aristotle and Averroes, the scientific spirit begins to wake up in Latin countries, until the sixteenth century, the church having the strength of the state at its disposal, managed to crush its foe; but in the seventeenth century scientific discoveries are too reverberativ to be hushed up. The church is still strong enough to seriously trouble the life of Galileo, to disturb Descartes, but not to hinder these discoveries from imposing laws on the intellect. In the eighteenth century reason triumphs; about the year 1800 scarcely any educated man believes any longer in the supernatural. The reactions that hav followed hav only been unimportant stops. If a good many timid minds, out of dread of great social questions, forbid themselvs to be logical, the mass of the population, alike in city and country, is straying further and further away from Christianity, and supernaturalism is losing some of its adherents daily. What has Christianity done to place itself on guard against this formidable assault, which will overthrow it unless it retires from certain hopeless positions? Assuredly the Reformation of the sixteenth century was an act of sagacity and self-preservation. Protestantism cut down the quota of supernaturalism; it reverted, in one sense, to primitiv Christianity, and reduced to a trifle the idolatrous and pagan element in the cult. But the principle of the miracle, especially so far as the inspiration of the canonical books was concerned, was held fast. The reformation, moreover, has not been able to reach the whole of Christendom; it has been outstripped by rationalism, which will probably suppress the subject of reform before the reforming has been done. Protestantism can only save Christianity by attaining to complete rationalism, and by effecting a junction with all free minds."

THE following astounding supposition is supposed in an inquiry to the editor of the Christian Advocate, Methodist:

"Suppose a member of the Methodist Episcopal church were guilty of crimes that, if brought to justice, would expel him from the church. But the member moves off the circuit without any charge being preferred against him. After he moves he writes for his church letter. Can the pastor withhold said letter on complaint of some member of the church that he will prefer charges against said applicant—on former circuit?"

Is it possible that any Methodist can be guilty of crime? By reading the average religious paper we would suppose that only Infidels committed crimes. Yet here we hav it again, and right in the same column of the same Methodist paper, and this time it's a minister! A grieved brother writes:

"I hav lost confidence in the minister of our church. He is not, in my opinion, an honest man, and, of course, not believing him to be an honest man, I cannot believe in his piety. Several of his practices, too, are not such as I think a consistent man would indulge in. I am much perplexed as to my duty with regard to attending church, and assisting in his support. To withdraw from the church to which I hav belonged for so many years, or to stay at home from religious services, seems very undesirable. If you can giv me any light, I will be much obliged."

To this appeal Brother Buckley answers:

"Our Lord Jesus Christ has settled this question, so that no follower of his need hav any trouble in coming to the conclusion that it is his duty to continue to hear him so long as he occupies the position of pastor in the legal manner. Great is the self-denial requisit to do so. The duty is plain. Turn to the twenty-third chapter of Matthew, and beginning with the first verse, read the following: 'Then spake Jesus to the multitude, and to his disciples, saying, The scribes and the Pharisees sit in Moses's seat: all therefore whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do, but do not ye after their works; for they say, and do not.' Here, then, our savior plainly commands that we are to listen to them."

Nothing like going to the fountain-head for authority. Now, a Catholic would hav gone to the bishop, and the bishop to the pope. But a pope is human, and therefore fallible. So the Methodist bishop goes to a book, for which substitution of a fallible man for an infallible book the world is indebted to Luther. Was the book made by man? Well, yes—but—but—believe or be damned!—— This column of answers to inquirers in the Advocate is unusually good "food for thought" this week. Another doubt-wracked soul inquires:

"Is there heterodoxy in the belief that the father of the universe will, in his infinit mercy, finally bring all his children, even the prince of the fallen angels, to a state of reconciliation and happiness?"

That Dr. Buckley is not touched by this heterodoxy is plain, for he says, decidedly:

"This doctrin is the essence of heterodoxy. If that is not heterodox there is no such word as heterodox in existence. Whoever can prove that true can prove the Bible false, for from one end of it to the other, without exception, it teaches a different doctrin."

Dr. Buckley's orthodoxy is unquestioned. He adds, moreover, that it would be difficult for a person who entertained the belief that God is too good to eternally burn anyone to answer the questions required by the ritual consistently. The Methodists, Presbyterians, and Catholics ought to combine forces and save expense.

Recent Publications.

THE AGNOSTIC ANNUAL. London: Cattell & Co. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

Those interested in Agnosticism, which is the popular word nowadays to describe a class of thinkers who, like Prof. Huxley, the inventor of the word, "confess themselvs hopelessly ignorant concerning a variety of matters about which metaphysicians and theologians dogmatize with the utmost confidence," will find the "Agnostic Annual," issued from the Secular Review office, to be the publication sought. The editor is Charles A. Watts, a worthy son of the noble sire who is now sojourning with us. His work has been well done, and the brilliant array of talent he has gathered to his aid makes his Annual invaluable.

The chief feature is a Symposium, or "merry feast," to which the invited guests are Prof. Huxley, P. A. Taylor, Prof. F. W. Newman (who takes pains to explain that he is not an Agnostic), James Beal, Prof. Ernst Haeckel, Saladin, G. M. McC., Charles Watts, W. B. McTaggart, Ignotus, and W. Sadler (Baldr). To Profs. Huxley, Newman, Haeckel, and Charles Watts, American Liberals need no introduction. The others are philosophical writers well known in England and deserve a wide recognition in America. Besides the Symposium, appear articles on "Agnosticism and Hylo-Idealism," by W. B. McTaggart; "Agnosticism and Immortality," by E. M. Macdonald; "Agnosticism and Education," by F. J. Gould; "Agnosticism and Positivism," by J. Kaines. D.Sc. Of the one on "Agnosticism and Immortality," it becomes us to speak modestly, but the others can be recommended. George Chainey has contributed an unusually brilliant paper on "The Ideal of Humanity," and Mr. S. P. Putnam givs man's aspiration a new direction in his entreaty to "Hope Onward, not Upward." Did space permit, we would like to make extracts from nearly all of the papers; we shall, however, find room for some of them in future issues.

Affirmation in Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your editorial in your last issue on "The Canadian Censorship Case," you quote from a "prominent member of the Montreal bar" that "in Canada there is absolutely no provision for a man to giv his oath who does not believe in the deity, or in a future state of rewards and punishments;" that if such a one "has no religious belief his evidence is not admissible."

It is not a little surprising that a prominent member of the bar should make such a mistake; but mistake it certainly is. In this province, Ontario, which is certainly a part of what the gentleman calls Canada, Agnostics, Atheists, and Materialists, or persons "having no religious belief," are fully entitled to giv evidence in all courts in the province, in all civil cases, by making an affirmation instead of taking the usual oath on the Bible. This law has been in force about two years. Such persons cannot, however, testify in criminal cases, as that requires Dominion legislation. The provincial government cannot legislate in this matter only in civil cases; but there is at present an agitation, having the activ support of many of the judges of the Queen's Bench, for Dominion legislation giving persons of "no religious belief" the right to giv evidence in all cases, civil and criminal.

In this county (Lennox), at the Assizes, a week or two ago, the judge charged the grand jury in favor of such a law, and the jury in their presentment fully concurred with the learned judge as to the desirability and necessity of such a law. It is sure to come, and is but a question of time—time near at hand.

Selby, Ont., Nov. 16, 1883. Allen Pringle.

The Poor of London.

In the National Reformer Annie Besant makes the hypocrisy of the church's efforts for the outcasts of London apparent. When the clergy are not willing that such a pamphlet as the "Law of Population" shall be circulated among the very ones who most need reformation, the electioneering character of their present outcry is too plain to need further pointing out. Mrs. Besant says:

An attempt is being made to stop the sale of the "Law of Population" by threats of prosecution. It is really a little too late in the day for folly of this kind. A barrister writing to the Daily News of Oct. 30th, with reference to the terrible distress in the East of London, points out that no remedy is possible while the increase of population there is so rapid. He says:

"Your contributor very truly observes that when a wise government and good citizens hav done their best, the miserable people whom he describes will be miserable still; they are so many, and they increase so fast. Competition will still be ruthless, wages will still be at the margin of starvation, there will still be hunger, disease, and vice. The father of the family will still be a machine to grind out a little food for famished children, the mother will still be a machine for multiplying them. Is there no remedy for this evil? Is there no way of freeing ourselvs from this residuum of torture and degradation? There is a remedy; there is a way of escape, and it has often been pointed out by the truest friends of the people. Children are not produced by causes over which we hav no control. They are neither an accident nor a necessity. To giv life to another human being is an act for which the parent is responsible. Among the highly educated this truth is so far recognized that no upright man will marry unless he has the prospect of maintaining his wife and rearing his sons and daughters in some decent and wholesome fashion. But members of the working class usually marry as soon as they become adults. They first burden themselvs with a family, and then look for the means of supporting it. Their conditions of life, as all physiologists agree, are favorable to a rapid increase. They never think of limiting the number of their offspring. Inmate after inmate is pressed into the little tenement, until it comes to resemble a cage in a menagerie. Combatant after combatant is pressed into the fearful conflict for a morsel of bread; and hardly one of those who wish best to the laboring man dares to tell him that in thus enslaving himself to an imperious instinct he is making perpetual the misery and debasement of his class. I know that the employer, the clergyman, the popular orator, hav each and all their motivs, good no doubt as well as bad, for encouraging this fatal recklessness. But if the state is really to do its duty by the working man, the working man must become a finite quantity. The state can provide the conditions of civilized life only for a fixed number. It can do this; it ought to do this. But only an omnipotent administration, using the resources of an inexhaustible exchequer, can provide cheap lodging, cheap education, open spaces, libraries, and museums for an altogether unlimited population."

The limitation of the family within the means of subsistence is absolutely necessary, if poverty is ever to cease out of the land. This fact is beginning to be appreciated by the poor themselvs, and thousands are rising out of extreme poverty by exercising conjugal prudence. Two or three well-fed, well-clothed children form the family of the educated artisan, instead of a dozen half-starved, ragged, miserable ones. This change is rapidly spreading among the poor, and the large circulation of the "Law of Population" has much contributed to it. It is madness to try to stop its sale, for now that the poor know that there is a way out of heartbreaking misery, no endeavors on the part of bigoted authorities will avail to prevent them taking it. Even supposing that a jury could be obtained ignorant and wicked enough to find me guilty of a crime in publishing the "Law of Population," such a folly would only quadruple the sale. There are brave hearts throughout the three kingdoms who would keep the sale going, despite every attempt to stop it made by bigoted capitalist Tories, who fatten on the misery of the overcrowded and underfed poor.

Work and Wages in New York City.

From John Swinton's Paper.

A professor of a college out West has sent a letter here asking information about the news spreading all over the country that the working people of New York city are dissatisfied with the present condition of industrial affairs, though he is told that the wages of journeymen bricklayers are $4 a day, with plenty of work; that plasterers are in demand at $4 a day for nine hours' work, and that work is brisk in all its branches. "What, then," asks the professor, "hav New York workingmen to complain of? Surely not of their wages of from $3 to $4 a day, for men, at that rate, ought to be able to support themselvs and their families in comfort, and save money besides."

So they could, if they were continuously employed. But the professor loses sight, or has never thought, of the fact that the wages he speaks of are not paid throughout the year—as he is paid—but only for the time they work; and though at first blush it may appear that wages are high, yet, when an average is made for a year, it will be found that wages are not so high after all.

Among the best paid skilled workmen of this city are the bricklayers, printers, plasterers, and stonemasons.

Bricklayers get $4 a day when at work. If this were paid every one of the 310 working days of the year, it would make the respectable sum of $1,240, and few bricklayers would grumble at that. But they are employed only about thirty weeks, or 180 days, in the year, supposing, of course, that bricklaying is brisk. If it is a dull year, they do not even get so many days' work. For that number of days' work they would receive $720—not much over one-half the "respectable sum" told of.

Every bricklayer in this city, if he and his family are halfway decently housed in a tenement, must pay in rent at least $17 a month for his rooms, or $204 a year. This leaves $515, or less than $10 a week, for food, clothing, fuel, and other necessaries for himself and family. If the professor has ever lived in New York he knows what these things cost, and he can see that after they hav been paid for there is little, if anything, left with which to purchase fancies, or to put by for a rainy day or sickness.

In the figures here used, no allowance is made for accidents or dull seasons. These are the highest wages that can be made in a good year by a bricklayer, and this is the lowest estimate of what it will cost him and his family to liv. Bricklaying, as the professor probably knows, is very hard work. As journeymen bricklayers succeeded in having their wages raised during the past ten years, just in the same ratio hav their tasks been increased—they hav to lay more bricks in a day now than they laid ten years ago. Among the best-known and most competent bricklayers in New York city to-day are Henry O. Cole, president of the National Bricklayers' Union; John W. Franklin, walking delegate for the unions of this city; Richard Matthews, John Keeny, Christopher Malone, and Sylvester Sullivan. If the professor desires to engage a bricklayer by the year, at $15 a week, or perhaps less, he will hav no difficulty in making a contract with one of the gentlemen above named. So much for the high wages paid to bricklayers.

The rate of wages paid to printers in this city is, according to the scale of their union, for day work, $3, or 40 cents per 1,000 ems; for night work, 46 cents per 1,000. To the printer in—say Michigan, who is probably working for $20 a month and his board and lodging, the figures must look as though his brethren in New York made big wages—and it might also appear so to the professor. Let them remember, however, that in no city or town in the United States is there so high a standard of workmanship demanded as in this city. There are very few printers here who hav an opportunity to earn, on day work, $18 a week the year around—probably not two hundred out of the five thousand now among us. About two-thirds of that number are employed seven months during the year, the remainder less than half the time. The average earnings of the morning newspaper compositor, when he works, is $3.50, and he works for it more than ten hours a day, or rather a night. All men know how exhaustiv night work is at the best, so that a man cannot do duty at it steadily; and it is safe to assert that few compositors holding situations on morning newspapers average over $15 a week throughout the year. With the printers known as "subs," who do not hold regular situations, but who wait around the offices for the chance to work for a "regular," the case is even worse. Their time is taken up looking for a job. Yet they may only work four, three, two nights a week, and perhaps may not get a chance to work at all. A "sub" who will average $10 a week the year around is a lucky man indeed. It costs printers about the same as bricklayers to support themselvs and families, and probably the professor can see that, after all, printers do not hav an opportunity to save much money. If he desires to secure the services of a first-class compositor by the year at $15 per week, or perhaps less, he will hav not the slightest trouble in doing so by notifying the secretary of the printers' union.

The plasterers, who are reported as getting $4 a day, can earn about the same as bricklayers—$720 a year, when business is brisk. Their expense account will foot up the same as the bricklayers and printers.

The best-paid laborers of this city earn, when they work, $2.50 per day; and in a busy year they will get from 175 to 200 days' work. It is only by the strictest economy that they manage to get along at all.

It is not necessary to speak of other trades. Here are illustrations enough for the professor.

After having read so far, the professor naturally asks, "Why do not these men, when work is dull in their trades, seek employment in some of the unskilled branches?" But where?

The Herald rarely prints less than twelve columns a day of small cards, averaging seventy-five to a column, from men and women who are seeking situations at almost any wages. The cards under the heading "Help Wanted" rarely reach a column.

Thus there are nine hundred advertising for work, and only seventy-five advertising for workers!

The Staats-Zeitung averages daily about twelve columns of applications for situations, and less than a column of workers wanted. And yet around these newspaper offices, about half-past 2 o'clock in the morning, crowds begin to gather, waiting for the papers to come from the presses, in order that they may read, not the news, not the twelve columns of advertisments for situations, but the less than a column of advertisments for workers. And after a hasty, eager reading of this column, the crowd scatter out to the addresses of the various advertisers and wait there in the cold and dark until morning breaks, anxiously watching for the coming of the person from whom they hope to get employment. No advertisment for help, no matter however small the pay or hard the work, can appear without receiving answers in person; and in the unskilled branches from twenty to fifty applicants will present themselvs for each situation.

Then where, professor, is the unskilled branch of labor for the skilled workmen during the dull times in their respectiv trades?

Aside from those who hav money enough to pay for advertising for a situation, there are thousands of honest men and women in this city who trudge from place to place, from morning till night, seeking for work at any price. They are willing to toil, but they can find no opportunity. Those people who work at trades, whether the season be good or bad with them, must be continually on the watch. If by any chance they get work in the unskilled branches, they may lose an opportunity to get work in their own trade, and thus they would be the losers.

If the professor would create an industry in which mechanics could work when their trades were dull, he would be hailed as a benefactor; but as he cannot, things will hav to go on just as they are, for the present at least.

"The working people of New York city are becoming very much dissatisfied with the present condition of industrial affairs," and the facts stated above show that they hav reason to be.

The professor will probably ask, at this point, "Is there no remedy?"

In answer it may be said that there are several remedies—some temporary and one permanent. Among the first is the shortening of the hours of toil. Labor is a marketable commodity, and when it is plenty—as is the case, not only in this city, but all over the country—those who hav it to sell go from place to place offering to any who will buy. When it is scarce, those who wish to buy must search for sellers and pay the price demanded. The thing to do, then, is to make it scarce, and it can, under present conditions, be done in but one way—by shortening the hours of labor, and continuing the process until all the surplus is absorbed. This must be done by the laborers themselvs. All the professors in the world cannot help them in the work. When the working people hav become sufficiently awakened to their own interests to see this they will hav taken a long stride toward bettering their condition.

One of the best ways to help along the cause of Freethought is to circulate The Truth Seeker. Trial subscriptions of three months for 50 cents.

Letters from Friends.

HOPKINS STATION, MICH., Nov. 6, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I think much of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and desire to help sustain it. I consider it the great apostle of political and religious liberty. But I am, just now, almost financially helpless, on account of being burnt out a short time since. Will send you pay as soon as I can recuperate a little.

Yours, R. L. TAYLOR.

ROCHELLE, ILL., Oct. 27, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me twelve copies of "False Claims," and charge to my account. I consider it one of the most powerful and convincing arguments ever produced by any of our representativ men. It is a whole modern, improved battery in itself. Each shot tells, and they strike thick and fast, and no candid reader will read it but to hoist the white flag of truce, and surrender at once. It is irresistible, and if all your subscribers would invest seventy-five cents and distribute them for promiscuous circulation, it would greatly help our cause and elevate the standard of Liberalism.

I had the pleasure of meeting friend Remsburg a short time ago, and listened to three of his popular lectures, and Mrs. Wettstein, as well as myself, was highly pleased with his candid and pleasant address, as well as with his powerful logic and argument.

We hope to hear him again before long.

Fraternally, OTTO WETTSTEIN.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Nov. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just been reading "Ten Little Handmaids" to my little girl, who expressed great delight at it. It is a simple, entertaining, and instructiv story for young children, and I was quite charmed with it.

The dear old TRUTH SEEKER has set an example that I hope the rest of the Freethought papers will not be slow to follow. Now my child will soon be as eager to see the paper each week as we are.

Soon after my last letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER I received the story of the "Little Red Mittens" from the author, Jennie Butler Browne, and wish to take this opportunity of thanking her. Had I known her address I should hav taken great pleasure in addressing my thanks to her. It was very kind of her, and highly appreciated by me.

The story—a pathetic, tender one—is well written, and contains many sound ideas.

As there seems to be a sort of vote among your correspondents on the liquor question, I wish you would enroll me as a teetotaler and prohibitionist.

WINEFORD V. ASPINWALL.

MURRAY, OHIO, Nov. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2. for which send me the inclosed list of books. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the most welcome paper I receive. I try to hav it read in this place as much as possible, but with the exception of my brother and myself, the people are, however, either connected with or ready to sustain some religious creed or other. I love liberty. and am ever ready to extend that liberty to all. I consider it a duty we owe, not to a God, but to ourselvs and society, to spread the light of liberty to the best of our ability, and help drive out of existence. to exterminate, ignorance and superstition. Where I see ignorance, I find superstition the predominating element. My abilities are limited. I wish I could do more, but it is consolation to read and see the effect of the great workers in the cause of Liberalism.

Inclosed find the names of some who would likely become subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

D. E. LEWIS.

ELAMSVILLE, NOV. 9, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Yours of Oct. 18th to hand some days ago; hav not received "Gottlieb, his Life," but hav received "The Besant-Hatchard Debate," which givs as good satisfaction as the other. I am a poor writer and hav but little education, or else I would tell some tales on some of my Christian friends down here. We hav some intellectual giants down here in old Virginia. Amongst them is one Rev. Jeremiah Spencer, of the persuasion of hard-shell Baptists. He is called by his brethren "mighty able." He was preaching, some time since, at Friendship church in this county. His subject was "Sinning Against the Holy Ghost." He was explaining what kind of sin it was that would never be forgiven in this world, nor in the one to come. He said, raising his voice to a thunder-pitch, that that terrible sin was to "ask God to do something for them that they could not do for themselvs."

Now this was terrible on the praying brethren, and, if true, they are all hypocrits, or hav sinned against the Holy Ghost; and in either case, according to their own doctrin, are doomed—eternally lost.

I saw, yesterday, a man that stands high in the church, drunk, beastly drunk, left by the road-side to puke and snore, and wallow in the dirt. That was yesterday; to-day he was a good brother in the Baptist church, crying "Amen" and "Hallelujah," etc. I will send you an order soon for some of Col. Ingersoll's lectures, and for truth seeker and "Manna" Tracts.

Fraternally yours, S. A. ROSS, JR.

TRUTH IS MIGHTY, AND WILL PREVAIL.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Nov. 19. 108.

MR. EDITOR: As the former remarks of T. Winter seem to stand well with many of your readers and supporters, I, for the last time this year, address a few lines to the intellectual portion of the admirers of the outspoken TRUTH SEEKER.

Fellow-mortals: We are all seeking some degree of happiness, and that is right. But some appear to be seeking it beyond the bounds of this planet. That, my friends, is your mistake. Good, sound sense must convince everybody that this world and this present life are the place and time to find solid happiness. Seek it here and now, and that kind of wisdom and truth will positivly secure to you a most pleasurable experience. Those who seek their happiness in the dark dismalisms of the Christian religion must ever be disappointed; also those nervous and emotional persons who are looking to some fantastic land of pure delight, by the eye of faith. They, also, are deluding themselvs. They clutch at the shadow and lose the substance. Sir, right here is our birth and home. We liv and die here, and that, my kind and sensible friends, is the final end of our existence, all theological or spiritual assertions to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sir, yours fraternally, THOS. WINTER,
Materialist.

MOUND CITY, NOV. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to join the shout and cry "All honor to the old wheel-horse, Jamieson, and to "Liberta!" and will add Mrs. Heddon.

I believe the promulgation of that "seventh plank," as a demand of Liberalism, to be a piece of arrogance worthy of the priesthood itself.

We will proclaim it from the house-tops that if the Walkerites, "or any other man," are bound to render aid and comfort to the more than infernal liquor oligarchy, they must step down below Liberalism to find a name behind which to hide, and let every Liberal in the land, who is sufficiently pure-hearted to believe that man has no moral right to do wrong, join us.

I believe the crusade against prohibition to be a miserable, selfish fanaticism—selfish, in that the crusaders would rather perpetuate the misery caused by liquor than giv up their toddy; fanatical, in that those who do not care for liquor hate prohibition, because the church has the grace to speak somewhat in favor of it.

Mr. Editor, I can never find fault with the grand and stalwart TRUTH SEEKER, but I tell you it hurts me to see its fair pages befouled with so-called "arguments" that were the common stock in trade of the lowest liquor hells thirty years ago. Of course the miserable lie that liquor will not hurt you if you let it alone is about played out, but how much better is the education argument? Where is the idiot that doesn't know that the educated man is more easily injured by liquor than the uneducated?

Friends of temperance and purity, let us rally and arrange matters so that the "seventh plank" will treat of something else next year.

Yours truly, A. W. SHUCK, M.D.

AUGUSTA, GA., NOV. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR. I send you another trial subscriber, with remittance in money order; also a few other selected names for sample copies, who will, I feel sure, become subscribers. I also inclose 25 cents for Billings's "Crimes of Preachers," and 30 cents for three of J. E. Remsburg's tract, "False Claims," to my address.

I am very glad indeed to know that Mr. Remsburg's speech at the Rochester convention has been published in tract form. I regard it as one of the ablest and most convincing articles of the kind I ever had the pleasure of reading. My number of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing it has done, and is still doing, good service.

Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been with us and stirred up the sluggish waters of orthodoxy, and the clergy in particular, on his theory of evolution. So strong is orthodox prejudice in the South against him, his heresy, etc., that but one or two ministers were in attendance at his lecture; and now that he has returned to his home, they hav been sallying forth, as is their custom toward all liberally inclined speakers, and firing after him imaginary shot. One divine, who failed to hear him of course, gave out that he would reply from his pulpit to Mr. Beecher's theory of man's origin as opposed to the Bible account of it. Due notice of his discourse was given in the city papers, and his parishioners were of course eager to hear him demolish Beecher and giv additional succor to their faith in the history as given by Moses. "Mr. Beecher," he said, "regarded the fall of Adam as a myth, and that if he fell at all it was an upward fall; that like all human beings he began life at the lowest point and worked upward." He stated that "the narrativ given in the Bible was either mythical, allegorical, or literal. If mythical, then the atonement is also a myth, and the Bible the production of man." He did not accept it allegorically, but literally and without reservation. He thought Beecher was making a bad use of his talent—was deceiving and being deceived. "It is a sad thing," he said, "to see a nice large ship drift from its moorings. Many a one, with its valuable cargo, now lies hidden in the mighty depths of the occean, of no avail to anyone. When a man with grand inspirations and noble intellect pulls loose from his anchorage to drift upon the merciless waves of Infidelity, he will find himself bumping against breakers which will sooner or later pull him down to the depths of endless ruin. Beecher is now at sea without rudder or compass; had been bumping against Darwin, Huxley, and other false teachers, and was now bumping against his own origin, the Bible, the patriarchs, Christ, and God."

After eulogizing and commending the Bible to his hearers as the highest authority and onlv correct history of man's existence, drawing a comparison between it and man's ancestry as being the lowest order of animal life, making the latter as odious and disgusting as possible, he pronounced the benediction.

His reply was certainly a most glorious failure, as might reasonably hav been expected from his premises. The idea of a ship or intellect never being loosed from its moorings is one that could emanate only from a narrow, bigoted mind. Of what use can they be, kept anchored? I say, every time, "Let 'er drift" out upon the great ocean of thought, taking the chances of gathering up some treasures and promoting intellectual growth, rather than be kept stock fast to a useless antiquated anchorage.

J. S. LYON, M.D.

IS THE DEATH OF THE PHYSICAL BODY THE END?

WOODHULL, ILL., Nov. 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Living, as we do, in an age of thought and inquiry—religious, political, and social—will you please giv me space in THE TRUTH SEEKER—a paper I hav honored from its birth—to place a few thoughts before its readers upon the problem of man's existence, which is now occupying the attention of the honest inquirer—"Is the death of the physical body the end?"

To argue this question, it would be folly in me to use the arguments of Paul and Solomon, as they do not agree upon this important question. Therefore I shall appeal to the laws of nature, and the natural results that of necessity follow, guided by the knowledge I hav of the operation of the laws in nature.

I trust there is no dispute as to the law that unites and connects the interest, as a necessitv for the appreciation of the value and worth, of the different kingdoms as arranged upon the line of progression and evolution—the mineral, the vegetable, the animal, and the spiritual.

The existence of the vegetable is made necessary for the appreciation of and to giv value and worth to, the mineral kingdom; as, in the absence of the vegetable kingdom, the mineral kingdom would be worthless and lost; and it is the animal kingdom that appreciates and realizes the value and worth of the mineral and vegetable combined, as in the absence of the animal kingdom both would be worthless and lost. Therefore, of necessity, the animal kingdom exists as a natural result. In like manner, man's existence is made necessary, as by him the appreciated value and worth combined is realized, he being the ultimate, the crown, and the highest type of physical existence, all centering in man, making man the legal heir to the use of the existing kingdoms, over which he is now exercising his power.

These are all plain facts, manifested through nature's laws. After nature has exercised her laws and power in such a magnificent manner throughout our globe (say nothing about millions of others), on a line of progression and unfoldment, as these kingdoms bear witness, and the final result after reaching man is to dump him into the grave, shall we say this is the end—the winding up of the operations of the laws and power of existence? Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther. It would be unnatural, unreasonable, and an insult upon the power that givs existence. It cannot be true. It givs the lie to the laws and power of evolution, and to all nations, and to thousands of our day of unimpeachable character. It may be claimed that man is the ultimate, capable of appreciating the value and worth of his existence, the privilege of the use of all connected with him thereby advancing his happiness; and this is all that is necessary, and man should be contented.

Suppose we admit the claim, what is it worth? Under the existing facts, one-half of mankind enter the grave before they arrive to a realization of their existence; so far a dead loss. Half of the other half linger out a miserable life of ignorance, and there are but a few (if any) to whom non-existence would not be preferable if they are annihilated at the grave.

Nature being well equipped with laws and power to execute them on such a magnificent line of progression and evolution as that we hav knowledge of, and to stop at the grave, we might in justice exclaim, Folly! Yes, worse than folly—"an insult upon man," as Ingersoll says.

Col. Ingersoll is claimed to hav said, speaking of people dying, "I would be a great engin-builder, to dump them off into the deep as fast as I made them." The colonel never spoke a truer word. This united with my argument makes existence of a spiritual kingdom (man being the ultimate) indispensable as a necessary result to save and make the power that produced man honorable In it this power can continue in operation through eternity, increasing in magnitude, and man, the highest type of intelligence, can appreciate the value and worth of his existence. Under this view, glory, honor, might, and dominion can justly be ascribed to the law and power that gave man his existence and the capacity of understanding.

To this I add the testimony of all nations and generations of whom we hav history—pagans, Jews, and Christians, together with thousands of our own age whose testimony is unimpeachable, that they hav seen, talked with, and communed with spiritual personages face to face, as one friend talks to another.

Here let me correct an error that is common—"a disembodied spirit." This expression is often used and applied to spirits clothed with a spiritual body, with form and organization complete, a fac simile of the original. As this is the only question in dispute between the Spiritualist and the Materialist, let us treat each other's persons with brotherly respect by giving argument instead of personal abuse.

This may be the last production of my pen, as I am past eighty-three years, and can scarcely write.

AAC PADEN.

WAVERLY, N. J., Oct. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1.50, which sum giv me credit for on your valuable TRUTH SEEKER. I promis to take the paper as long as I am able to, although I am very poor. I am not well either, and hav a father and mother that are blind, and I hav to take care of them. I will send the balance before the new year. Yours truly, JOHN N. BALL.

MT. VERNON, MO., NOV. 14, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1, for which send me the inclosed list of pamphlets. I may possibly get a few old superstitious fogies to begin to investigate. I hope to be able to pay for and read your valuable paper as long as I liv, for my emergence from the hot-bed of Christian filth is due in a large measure to its glorious pages.

You hav my best wishes for yourself and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Z C. DENNEY.

BANGOR, ME., NOV. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: While on the train from Bangor to Augusta, a few days since, I fell in with an old friend, who was on his way as chief cook to New Hampshire in a crew of about fifty men.

I told him the value of the best paper printed, and also that I would send it to him free of charge if he would lend his influence to hav each and every one subscribe for it before leaving in the spring.

Inclosed find money to send THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months to him. F. F. PHILLIPS.

KENT, IOWA, NOV. 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, for which send one dozen tracts containing Remsburg's lecture, and one of Mitchell's, and some of Wakeman's; and please forward $2 to Brother Hacker.

I am getting old, but I was able to rig up my team and take a neighbor to hear our grand champions of Freethought, Watts and Chainey, lecture in Creston, twelve miles distant, and was very much delighted with both of them. They delivered four lectures to a large and respectable audience on Sunday.

Your sincere friend, JOSIAH ELLIOT.

ADRIAN, MICH., Oct. 16, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me twelve copies of Wakeman's reply to Mitchell; also the same number of Remsburg's "False Claims" made by the church, and the same number of Watts's speech. These three little missionaries of intelligence and love ought to be spread broadcast over the land. They are a much superior trinity to that of the Christians—father, son, and Holy Ghost. Remsburg is a regular sub-soiler; Watts comes along with the cultivator and drag to mellow up the soil and remove the truck that may lie scattered around, which might possibly vegetate and be a hindrance to the growth of the prospectiv crop; then comes Wakeman to sow the seed for a new religion, based on science and common sense. S. D. MOORE.

PRAIRIE CITY, NOV. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50—$2.50 as my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and $1 for the "Golden Throne," by S. P. Putnam. I hav been thinking what a trifling little thing it was that caused all of this muss about religion—its fears of hell and love of heaven. I hav it summed up in a small sphere. It is all because Adam ate that apple which his good wife gave him; and if my wife should offer me some delicious fruit, I should certainly partake of it and take the chances of my friends being punished 6,000 years afterward. Such absurdities will do for those that do not read THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav been a constant reader of your valuable paper for about six years, and think that I cannot do without it. Yours for truth,

E. L. SANDFORD.

BROADVIEW, NOV. 5, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: If your valuable paper is still alive, and this reaches you, please send me a copy at once, and consider me a subscriber just as soon as I can get your correct address to send subscription fees. For the past six months I hav been overrun with a set of begging vagrants who call themselvs ministers of the gospel. Our little town is about eight months old, and we hav six specimens of denominations (or abominations) trying to beg enough to build a church (each). I was arguing the point with one, and he asked me which was first—the hen or the egg. I told him I would hav to consider the matter, and I must hav your help if possible. I think by taking your paper and digesting a few of your tracts, I will make them let me liv in peace, if nothing more.

Hoping to hear from you at your earliest convenience, I remain Yours truly, W. P. WEST.

CASNOVIA, MICH., Oct. 31, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I received your note, and I will say that I neglected to send the money to you for the paper—why, I cannot tell, unless it be that we are liable to overlook the interests of the newspaper man—which, I confess, should not be so. I am very well pleased with your paper, although it does not support my theory, which is, spiritual life and spirit identity after death. I hav read in your paper some good articles on the subject, both pro and con; yet, having practically lived with the departed for thirty-one years, conversing with them daily, it is just as evident to me that they liv as that mortals do on earth. I hav thought of replying to some articles in your paper, but when I think that I had but nine months' schooling, it is very embarrassing to me, and I dare not take hold of it.

Now, as I am taking four papers besides yours, I will inclose you $3.00.

Yours with respect, R. H. TAPPING.

CLEVELAND, O., NOV. 12, 283.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Truth Seeker Collection of Forms and Hymns," and I am well pleased with them, for they hav far exceeded my expectations, and I think that every Liberal should hav a copy. The Liberal League here is getting in good working order now at last, and we will enter the list of progressiv thinkers next Sunday, the 19th, with a lecture on our relation to the solar system, by our vice-president, Dr. Newcomer, which will be the first of a series of lectures and debates to take place before the League. We intend to make our meetings as interesting as possible, and to make the men of god and the devil feel our presence here, as we intend to giv them a thorough overhauling.

Find inclosed 50 cts., which please use as follows: 35 cts. for Nos. 4 and 5 of the "Humboldt Library of Science," and 15 cts. for one copy of Mr. J. E. Remsburg's "False Claims." After this month I will send for more of them for missionary work, which I intend to inaugurate on a small scale myself. Wishing you all success, I remain

Yours truly, DENNIS A. LOSSING.

HAMPTONVILLE, CAL., NOV. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please change my address from Hamptonville to Fresno, Cal. I am going into a little Sodom of churches. The city will know I am come as soon as I get there, for I shall not hide my light under a bushel. I hav sent on one article against the church and clergy, containing questions, but they hav not replied, though the editor offered them room in the county paper to do so. I am not able to buy all the books and papers that I need, as there are six or seven different churches and preachers. If any friend of freedom has any pamphlets or papers to spare, and will send them to me, and also a letter with their name and post-office address, I will send them a Fresno paper by return mail as assurance that I received the package.

Editor Eugene, if I can be of any service to you as agent for books or papers, please state your plan. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from the first number.

P.S.—I wish you would giv one page weekly in THE TRUTH SEEKER for the purpose of discussing the best plan for governing the United States, and the best men for president and vice-president. Benjamin Butler and Robert Ingersoll are both great and good men. G. PADDINGTON.

WEST BRIGHTON, NOV. 11. 283.

MR. EDITOR: Within find inclosed 15 cts. for Remsburg's "False Claims."

I am pleased to learn that the Liberals are going to hav a convention at Salamanca, N. Y. That would be a glorious time for me, if I could attend. But I shall expect to see the lectures published in the faithful old TRUTH SEEKER. I know you will not disappoint me. The old TRUTH SEEKER never disappointed me yet. As has been said before, It's the Bible for me. I think the inspiration of it goes ahead of the divine inspiration they claim for the Bible. If the Christians' God can't inspire anything better than mortal man can, I think he is about played out. Instead of noticing sparrows and counting the hairs of our heads, he had better turn his attention more to the inspiration business.

One word to friend Winter: He is sure that Spiritualists do not get any help from the summer-land. How does he explain how Mrs. Colby, of Boston, can entertain a large audience for two hours without any preparation on her part, ready for any subject at the spur of the moment? I hav never heard her match, and others say the same. I hope they will succeed in getting her at Salamanca. I hope friend Winter will giv me some explanation on the above question. The strongest proof, to me, in favor of Spiritualism, is the query, in my own mind, How she can speak as she does without help from some source that I am not acquainted with? Excuse me for wearying your patience. I am making arrangements to send you some filthy lucre before long.

S. E. SKINNER.

DALLAS, TEXAS, NOV. 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Some months ago I wrote to THE TRUTH SEEKER to say that I was sorry that you did not take up the land question and discuss it, so that the masses could see that Freethinkers were doing something to bring them out of physical as well as mental slavery. I see by the last few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that the question is coming up in grand style. Mr. Hacker sounds the alarm, and I hope it will be taken up all along the line. The only thing that surprises me is that he has kept silent so long—or did you crowd him out, as most so-called Liberal papers hav done, with what they were pleased to call the "rag, tag, and bobtail" of Liberalism? I should not be surprised to see your subscription list roll up in a manner that you will not expect. Giv Jeremiah Hacker plenty of space, and you will find that there are thousands scattered over the country who think as he does. I should like to be able to write you something about what is going on in Texas, but I hav not the time. A "workingman" may hav ideas, but not opportunity to express them.

I understand that Remsburg is coming to Dallas on the 30th. I think he will meet with a good reception, as this is an Infidel stronghold, although unorganized. Yours for justice, THOS. T. KNIGHT.

JACKSON, MICH., NOV. 15, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been taking your paper now for a year, through your agent here at Jackson, and my only regret in regard to the paper is that I had not found it long before I did.

I hav just been up to hear a revival crank by the name of Weeber that holds forth at a fine twenty-thousand-dollar tabernacle of superstition here in our city. He has made quite a number of converts by the excitement he gets up; and I notice that the heads of his most zealous ones hav a great tendency to slope straight back from the nose—but this is not what I started out to write. Cannot you send me some sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I can distribute amorg the people at the gate for the purpose of enlightening them in a reasonable and scientific way? Or perhaps you could print me something special. I myself will giv five dollars toward that purpose.

Here is a story I heard some years ago, which I think will bear repeating: A Jew was selling at auction "The Lord's Last Supper." Somebody bid twelve shillings. "What!" said the Jew, "a shilling apiece for the apostles, but not a cent for Jesus Christ! Not by a d—d sight! You must raise something for Jesus." JOHN DESMOND.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, NOV. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find an article of mine which appeared in last week's Lake City Blade, it being an answer to a slanderous charge made against Infidels and Atheists at a funeral of one of our neighbors, where we had done all we could for the deceased while living, and had furnished a team and double buggy to take the mourners to the grave, walking ourselvs to hear the sermon preached. As the communication will explain itself, I will say but little in regard to it, except it has caused the whole godly flock to make a mighty fluttering. I guess the shot must hav been hot. To say that they are perfectly awful mad is putting it mild. But the pious fraud making the greatest amount of fuss about my article stands very much before this community as I think old David did before his about the time of his unpleasantness with Uriah and wife. Our Uriah still livs, and is a splendid man in the community.

Let me take this opportunity to thank Mrs. Slenker for her kind, noble letter in regard to Mr. Bennett's monument. I truly pity the poor, puny soul that cannot giv a dollar to an aged, infirm, old man because some other person has given money to build a monument to Mr. Bennett. I hav given to Mr. Bennett and to the monument, and to our old friend and benefector, Father Hacker, also. I am not rich, but to giv makes me happy. Let our timid Christian friend try it. I shall send Father Hacker a dollar in the next mail.

Now, a few words in regard to your many interesting articles on Materialism and Spiritualism. I hav read both sides, hoping to be able to judge fairly, but I must say that I still remain a Materialist. Having never received a revelation from God, I can not believe the Bible. Others claiming to hav done so is no evidence to me. It is the same with Spiritualism. I hav had no revelation from the beyond. Although I hav lost many near and dear friends, all are as silent as the grave. Must I hav some blatherskite between them and me before I can hear from them? It looks too extremely thin for me.

If mind is eternal, then it never had a beginning, but has existed throughout all time, and can never hav an end. If it ever had a beginning it must come to an end. And as I do not remember anything that took place eighteen hundred years ago, or know any of the old frauds or cranks of that time, I think mind is a thing of this world. Were it not so, we surely would know as much of the spiritual as we do of the material world. Are we to lose our identity? If so, let us sleep sound and long.

With best regards for all THE TRUTH SEEKER family, I am, Ever yours, J. L. TOMPKINS.

All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and givs everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winsted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep luto the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Fighting Francis; or, A Kiss for a Blow.

Francis Walker was not considered a very good boy. He was the terror of the neighborhood, and was known as "Fighting Francis." He boasted that he could "lick" every boy in the village, and the boys were rather afraid of him. So, when a party was made up to go chestnutting, "Fighting Francis" was left out by unanimous consent.

A merry party it was in the woods that day, of gleeful, laughing, frolicsome lads and lassies. They had such grand sport gathering the chestnuts, shaking them from the limbs, hitting them with big sticks and knocking them to the ground, and then filling their pails, bags, and baskets.

"I like them roasted, don't you, George?" and Louisa spit out one she was trying to eat.

"I like 'em raw," replied George.

"So do I," said Katy Blake.

"Oh, look, look, look! See the squirrel!" screamed Nannie Fielding.

"Where?" they all exclaimed.

"There!—see him? There he goes—see!"

"Oh, I wish I could catch him," said George. "He's chestnutting, too, I guess."

There sat Mr. Squirrel, contentedly nibbling a chestnut, a short distance from the party, but apparently unconscious of their proximity. While they were cautiously viewing the cunning little creature, and Henry Temple was explaining how easily they might set a trap and capture him, they were startled by a chestnut burr that came whizzing from somewhere, and hit George Benton square upon his lips. Of course it hurt him and made him angry.

"I wish I knew who did that," he half sobbed. "I'd—I'd—I'd turn him inside out, I would!"

"Well, you can very soon find out!"

The faces of the boys and girls turned pale when they heard that voice, for well they knew to whom it belonged. They looked in the direction of the sound, and, sure enough, there stood "Fighting Francis" in battle array, with his fists doubled up and his coat lying on the ground.

"I can lick any two of you, if ye want to fight! You're a great set of fellows, to come off here nutting without saying a darned word to anybody but yourselvs. I've a great mind to lick the whole lot of ye!" and, so saying, another chestnut burr came flying down upon the group, and hit Gerge Benton again, this time upon his nose.

Human nature—boy nature—could not stand that insult, and, without more ado, the boys closed in a hand-to-hand combat, which was just what Francis Walker desired. He had felt hurt, at first, to think he was not asked to join the party, and then mad, and his only remedy, as he thought, was to fight.

The girls scampered away at the beginning of the trouble, and stood off a little distance, watching the fray, while the boys lingered near by to see fair play, they said.

"Oh, I cannot stand it," said gentle Nannie. "I cannot bear to see boys pound each other so. I am going to put a stop to it."

"What can you do, you silly thing? You'd better keep away," advised Lily Miller.

But she ran right to the spot where the two were pummelling each other, and without a word, ran right in between them. At that instant Francis had raised his hand to strike, and he could not stop the momentum of the blow, and it descended, not upon George Benton, as he intended, but full upon Nannie's pretty cheek.

"Shame! Shame!" cried the company.

Nannie did not speak, but her blue eyes filled with tears, for the blow hurt her.

"I didn't mean to hit you," said Francis sulkily.

"But the blow would hav hurt George just the same," sobbed Nannie. "Francis!"

"What?"

"Why do you fight so? What makes you so bad?"

"Born so."

"Born bad, Francis?"

"I guess so, I'm sorry I hit you, though," said he, panting.

"Then there's good enough in you to be sorry, Francis. Won't you be a—different boy Francis?—please, won't you?"

The flush on his freckled face grew deeper and redder, but not from anger, now, but from shame and mortification. He looked at the bruise on Nannie's cheek that his hand had accidentally made, and thought he would like to crawl away somewhere and die—he was so ashamed. He did not fight girls, he said, only boys, and here was a girl that he had struck.

He wanted to say he would be a better boy, but there were the others looking at him. No, he was too proud, he thought, to make a promis, but he would run away from them, and go home. So he started and ran, but he couldn't run away from his thoughts—nobody can. If we hav evil thoughts for companions, they will follow us wherever we go, and lose no opportunity to hurt and pain us. On the contrary, good, pure, noble thoughts will, when such are our companions, bless and comfort us in every place and circumstance of life. Francis ran until he came to a stone wall, which he essayed to jump, and fell, and when he attempted to rise, he found he could not walk—he had sprained his ankle.

"Oh," he groaned, "I shall hav to stay here and die!" forgetting that only a minute or two before, he was wishing for that same event. Fortunately, however, a wood-chopper, near by, heard his moans, and came to his assistance.

"Oh, this is 'Fighting Francis,' isn't it?" inquired the wood-chopper.

Francis groaned in pain and shame. "I ain't 'Fighting Francis' any more," he moaned.

"Oh, well, I'm mighty glad to hear it; I am so. Come, I'm about ready to go home now, and I'll help you along to the cart, for I see you can't walk very well."

As they jogged along toward the village, the wood-chopper inquired, "What were you doing, my lad, with your coat on your arm? It's a pretty raw day to be in your shirt-sleeves."

"I was—a—oh, my ankle!—nutting," for he was ashamed to tell what he was really about.

"Did you ever think what makes the nuts fall down instead of up? Curi's, isn't it?"

"What is the reason?" asked Francis.

"Well, I've kinder read and studied it out, and, I tell you, boy, there's a good deal to be studied out in these very woods. And in the world!—well, it would take about fourteen thousand lifetimes—that is, of ordinary length—to learn all there is to be known. This earth," he continued, "is one great magnet; it draws everything to its bosom. You toss up an apple; down it comes to the earth. That's what set Sir Isaac Newton thinking till he found out the laws of gravitation. Look at the leaves and things on the edge of that pond there, and the sticks; why don't they float out into the middle of the pond? They can't; the earth, the shore, attracts and pulls them to itself."

"So, when I fell, the earth pulled me to itself by attraction," said Francis.

"Exactly. The sun is a big magnet, too. It attracts and pulls and balances all the planets, and keeps them all in order, and keeps us all alive, too. Some think it is pulling this grand old earth, on which we liv, gradually to itself; but you needn't be afraid, boy, for it is so far away that it will not probably finish the job in my time, nor yours."

"How far off is it?" inquired Francis, thoroughly interested.

"Only about ninety-five million miles—or, more correctly, about ninety-two millions and a half," laughed the old man, "and it doesn't do anything in a hurry, I can tell you. We on the earth here get about one twenty-three-hundred-millionth part of the light of the sun—that is, the sun is able to feed with light twenty-three hundred million worlds of the size of ours, and it will take the sun just about ninety billions of years to shed its light out and disappear like a used-up candle. So, as I said, boy, you needn't be afraid of being drawn up to the sun and baked alive in your time, nor of living without the light of the sun's eyes to illuminate your path through the world."

"What is the earth?—how did it come to be?" inquired Francis.

"The earth is a child of the sun. It takes the sun twenty-five and a half days to turn on its axis, and as it turns, naturally, matter is thrown off into space. Motion is life, and gradually the earth grew from a speck to its present size. It took a lot of time, I tell you, to get it into its present shape, and it isn't finished yet; it is still growing. Time is a great thing. Do you know how long it would take you to count one billion?"

"No, sir; maybe half a day."

"Well, it would take about forty-five years to count a billion, if you counted ten hours a day. But here we are at your home;" and the man helped Francis to his door, and bade him good-day.

Francis had forgotten all about his ankle while listening to the wood-chopper, and he wondered how a working man like him could know so much. While he was laid up with his sprained ankle, he had plenty of time for reflection, and long before he recovered, he resolved to be a better boy and fight no more at school.

He studied very hard at school, and everybody noted the change in his conduct. When he grew to be a young man, he studied law, and its practice gave him plenty of scope to exercise the combativness that was born in him, though he said he should not hav learned to control it so soon, had it not been for pretty Nannie Fielding.

It was a beautiful October day, just like the one when Nannie caught that unfortunate blow, that she and Francis Walker were walking together in that same grove, he, a young and handsome man, and Nannie, a grown up young lady. The trees were in their autumn dress of bright red, yellow, green, and mottled brown. Scarlet berries in great clusters hung on the bushes, and the chestnuts, tucked in their burry suits, lay on the ground, or clung to their nativ branches, as in the days gone by.

"I was not a perfect boy, Nannie," said Francis, "and I am not a perfect man, but I do the best I can."

"And that is all any of us can do," answered Nannie. "But you dealt me a stinging blow, that day, Francis."

"You know I did not intend to do it, and I never regreted anything more in all my life, and now, as we are on the same ground, I am going to giv you a kiss, Nannie." And then he kissed her.

"A kiss for a blow, Francis," laughed Nannie. "Yes," he answered.

Of course you hav guessed that they are lovers. So they are, and they are to be married in a week.

"The kind words you gave me, and the pained, beseeching expression of your face, Nannie, that day, when I was so angry, did more to change the current of my life and actions, than anything else that I remember," said Francis.

Perhaps one may not always giv a kiss when a blow has fallen hard and heavy upon him; few would feel exactly in the mood to giv a kiss, but, in its place, one may bring himself to utter a kind word, to make a gentle remonstrance, and thus be the means of turning a life from vice and evil, to paths of honor, truth, and goodness.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

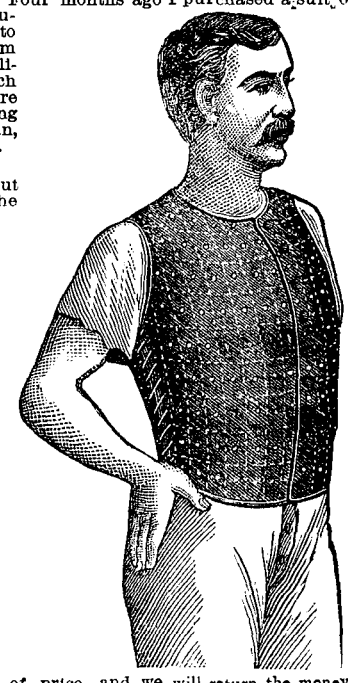
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Labarum of Constantine.

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders; and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in out. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

Gems of Thought.

THE whim we hav of happiness is somewhat thus. By certain valuations and averages, of our own striking, we come upon some sort of average terrestrial lot; this we fancy belongs to us by nature and of indefeasible right. It is simple payment of our wages, of our deserts; requires neither thanks nor complaint; only such overplus as there may be, do we account happiness; any deficit again is misery. Now, consider that we hav the valuation of our deserts ourselvs, and what a fund of self-conceit there is in each of us—do you wonder that the balance should so often tip the wrong way, and many a blockhead cry: See there, what a payment; was ever worthy gentleman so used! I tell thee, blockhead, it all comes of thy vanity; of what thou fanciest those same deserts of thine to be. Fancy that thou deservest to be hanged (as is most likely), thou wilt feel it happiness to be only shot; fancy thou deservest to be hanged in a hair halter, it will be a luxury to die in hemp.—Carlyle's Sartor Resartus.

THE happy day may come when science, in the form of a benign old gentleman, with a bald head [2 Kings ii, 23-25], and spectacles on nose, holding some beneficent compound in his hand, will confront a standing army and a standing army will cease to exist. That will be the final victory of intellect. But in the meantime our acknowledgments are due to the primitiv inventors of military organization and military disciplin. They shivered Goliath's spear. A mass of comparativly unwarlike burghers, unorganized and undisciplined, though they may be the hope of civilization from their mental and industrial qualities, hav as little of collectiv as they hav of individual strength in war; they only get in each other's way and fall singly victims to the prowess of a gigantic barbarian. He who first thought of combining their forces by organization, so as to make their numbers tell, . . . and who taught them to obey officers, to form regularly for action, and to execute united movements at the word of command, was perhaps as great a benefactor of the species as he who grew the first corn or built the first canoe.—Lectures and Essays by Goldwin Smith, D. C. L.

SWEAT is the destiny of all trades, whether of the brow or of the mind. God never allowed any man to do nothing. How miserable is the condition of those men who spend their time as if it were given them, and not lent; as if hours were waste creatures, and such as should never be accounted for; as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning: Item—Spent upon my pleasures, forty years! These men shall once find that no blood can privilege idleness, and that nothing is more precious than that which they desire to cast away—time.—Bishop Hall.

"DON'T overdrive," is a timely advice to the thoughtless and a warning to the reckless. It is good advice to be posted up in the counting-room, in the workshop, the study, and the kitchen. Don't overdrive your brain. It asks for a slower pace. Let the reins hang loose for a while. If the task must be done, take more time for it. Don't overdrive your stomach. It lacks the tone for hard work. Don't eat more than you can digest. Liv simply and rationally. Don't overdrive with the nerves or muscles. If you must work hard—and many people hav little choice in the matter—don't worry about your work. —Christian Register.

To the service of the church, by the intentions of my parents and friends, I was destined of a child, and in mine own recollections, till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded the church, that he that would take orders must subscribe slave and take an oath withal; which unless he took with a conscience that would rebel [stretch?], he must either straight perjure or split his faith; I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence, before the sacred office of speaking, bought and begun with servitude and forswearing.—Milton's Reason of Church Governments.

MERE appeal to popular prejudice should hav no place in discussions about truth, and he who has recourse to this weapon in so far weakens the cause he advocates.—Principal Shairp.

THERE is nothing impossible, nothing superhuman, nothing very difficult, devolving upon any individual to perform, but the duties of life are easy, every day to be occupied in some useful employment to benefit his condition and to add a little to the aggregate of human good deeds.—D. M. Bennett.

IF all events are the effects of preceding causes, and God, the supreme power of the universe, acts only through natural laws, prayer in the form of petition is irrational and useless, unless it can be proved that prayer is a natural force. Upon the orthodox ideas of God, petition to him to vary the succession of cause and effect is unreasonable and wrong. It is asking for blessing which involves suffering to others. The sailor who prays for a fair wind really asks that other sailors, equally deserving of prosperity, may hav a head wind; and supposing that sailors pray, God is daily besought that the wind may blow from every point of the compass. How can he grant any of these petitions without injustice, even if the direction of the wind were not determined by natural laws which God has never interrupted? The flour merchant, praying for a rising market, asks God to do that which will make the laborer pay more for his bread. The laborer asks for cheap bread. How can God answer both? The prosperity of the one often means the adversity of the other; the success of the one, the disappointment of his perhaps equally deserving fellow. How can a just God discriminate in the bestowal of answers.—R. C. Adams.

NOTHING is more usual among states which hav made some advances in commerce, than to look on the progress of their neighbors with a suspicious eye, to consider all trading states as their rivals, and to suppose that it is impossible for one of them to flourish but at their expense. In opposition to this narrow and malignant opinion, I will venture to assert that the increase of riches and commerce in one nation, instead of hurting, commonly promotes the riches and commerce of all its neighbors; and that a state can hardly carry its trade and industry very far, where all the surrounding states are buried in ignorance, sloth, and barbarism.—Hume's Essays.

Odds and Ends.

THE generous giv according to their means. Others giv according to their meanness.

"AUNTY, vat makes the little baby cry so?" Do it want its mudder?" "Yes dear, and its fodder, too."

A BALTIMORE woman by the name of Charity struck her husband over the head with a boot and came near killing him. Charity begins at home.

THE published report of a benevolent society says: "Notwithstanding the large amount paid for medicin and medical attendance very few deaths occurred during the year.

A CHICAGO commercial traveler says that in a small village in Northern Michigan he found a notice pinned on the door, which read: "Gone to bury my wife; will be back in thirty minutes."

A GENTLEMAN met an uncertain acquaintance, who said: "I'm a little short, and should like to ask you a conundrum in mental arithmetic." "Proceed," replied the gentleman. "Well," said the short man, "suppose you had $10 in your pocket, and I should ask you for $5. How much would remain?" "Ten dollars," was the prompt reply.

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher being anxious to test the mental powers of his not over-intelligent pupils, asked them to tell him their idea of to-morrow after giving the subject a week's thought. On the following Sunday he put the question to one of the scholars, who promptly replied, "To-morrow was cast into the oven." Which was certainly according to scripture.

"WHY, child," said ma, "you startle me,
To see you sit so near that boy;
In all your actions you're too free—
Which don't become a maiden coy."
"A boy I always wished to be,
Dear ma, and I'll pursue this plan;
For as that can't be," said she,
"I'll get as near one as I can."

"JOHN," said the Sunday-school teacher, "why didn't you giv your brother a piece of your apple?" "Cause, ma'm, I want it myself." "But, Johnny, don't you know it is better to giv than to receive?" "Yes'm." "Then why don't you do it?" "I did yistiddy, ma'm." "How?" "A boy gimme a chew of tobacker with a worm in it, and I told him thankee, and took it right away and giv it to Tommy Brown, who's jest learnin' and don't know worms when he sees 'em."

THE presence of John Slugger Sullivan in a Western town last Sunday, had its effect even on the minds of the children, as is attested by the following: A gentleman was talking to the Sunday-school scholars of the Second Presbyterian church, and he asked who Solomon was and there was no answer. "Who was Solomon, children?" he repeated. A hand popped up over in the corner. "Well, my boy, tell us who Solomon was." "He's the boss slugger as knocks 'em all out in four rounds."

MY dear," exclaimed Mrs. Jay Gould, picking up a new diamond paper weight, "this will never do. We must economize." "Well, shall we giv up the steam yacht?" asked Mr. Gould, lighting a cigar with a $50 bill. "Oh, no!" We can't spare that." "How about seal-skin sacques?" "I hav only nineteen now, and none of them looks fit to be seen." "Why not stop buying diamonds?" "Mercy! what are you thinking of? The doctor says I need exercise, and how can I get exercise if I don't go shopping?" "Very true; but, as you say, something must be done. Ah, I hav it! I will just order another reduction of wages."

"WELL," said an Austin merchant to a young man in his office, "I understand that you desire a position in my employ." "Yes, sir," replied the youth, "and I think I can furnish you good testimonials." "Well," said the merchant, "to be frank with you and not beat around the bush too much, I hav already obtained information concerning you." "Ah, that pleases me," rejoined the youth. "Yes, I hav been told that you quite frequently take a drink or two too much." "Indeed! The same has been told me of yourself, but I don't believe it. No man who was in the habit of taking too much liquor would hav kept me waiting here so long without asking me to step out and indulge. I don't believe I want to work for you, anyway. I think you hav been misrepresented to me. Good day, sir."

HE was a slow coach. Her mother said so; the old man said so. Her big brother said so, and scowled darkly when he threatened to call him to account. The reason for all this was that he had long hesitated to pop the question. He and she were sitting in the gloaming. She said: "Alfonso, were you ever engaged?" "Yessum," was the sad and unexpected reply. She winced, but immediately rallied and continued: "Did the adored one cruelly break her plighted troth?" "No, I severed my connection—" "Oh, you cruel-hearted flirt." "Yes, the firm I was engaged with heartlessly bounced me." "Oh, a firm—your employers? and for why, Alphonsy!" she said snuggling closer to him on the rustic bench. Alphonso hitched a little nearer off, and replied gloomily: "For mental incapacity." "Oh, no, say not so," said the girl with the oyster mouth; "you are not ignorant." "Yes I am," said Alfonso, "I'm a howling idiot." "Oh, no, you are keen, young, bright, and intellectual. You hav a future before you to be shared by some warm and loving heart." "No, the future is all a blank—blank as my own vacant mind. On the body politic I'm but a wart." "Think of the happy home you might rear for you and—and—" "No, I'm such a blamed fool I never could accumulate enough property to put in tea. Financially I'm a total wreck and intellectually busted from away back. Physically I'm nothing but a shell." "Oh, say not so, Alphonsy." "If I only had a cheap, second-hand ten-cent throne, my fractured reason would be sure to totter and wobble all over it." "But papa says you are quite a successful speculator." "That's where the old man's off." "And mamma says you own a fine house." "The good woman errs. I'm penniless." "And my big brother declares that unless you mean business, and that your intentions are honorable, that he proposes to horsewhip you on sight in the most prominent street in town, and that you hav got to either cash up or draw out of the game."

Notes and Clippings.

A WELL-KNOWN preacher, named Josiah Jackson, of Barnesville, S. C., was caught a few nights ago helping himself to the fruit in a melon-patch. He had a horse and cart with him, and was filling the wagon with the melons.

PROF. E. S. MORSE, in a lecture in Boston on Japan, said that the rich Japanese send their children to school in inferior garments, in order that the children of the poor, who can get no others, may not be ashamed to wear their own clothing.

GEOLOGISTS assert that if the continents and the bottom of the ocean were graded to a uniform level, the earth would be covered with water to the depth of one mile. So much greater is the depression of the ocean bed than the elevation of the existing land.

JUSTICE PATTERSON, a New York judge, delivered a short sermon to the court attendants last Sunday morning. He said: "I hav reason to find fault with the methods of many preachers nowadays. The misery and vice of a big city should not be introduced in their sermons at all. It is demoralizing to the young. It is very bad."

THE efforts of the Brooklyn preachers to put a stop to Sunday courting, so that the young people may attend church, is not receiving universal indorsement. "Sunday courting," says Progress, "has been in vogue ever since there was a Sunday to court on, and all the ministers who ever lived, or ever will liv, cannot stop it."

SEVERAL instances are quoted in a recent issue of the Salt Lake Tribune of the futil efforts of gentiles to engage in business in Utah with success. The Mormons, even if they want to trade elsewhere, are compelled to patronize the "Lord's Store," run by the church, and every effort is made in underhand ways to break up non-Mormon stores.

THE German laborers who come to this country find themselvs unable to compete with nativ workmen. A German paper reports that German emigrants return weekly in great numbers from America. One hundred agricultural laborers returned recently from Chicago to their old homes in East Prussia. They explained their ill success by the much quicker, but less thorough, work of the Americans with whom they had to compete. They had with difficulty earned their passage money.

THE queen of England lodges regardless of cost and of the fact that hundreds of her beloved subjects are houseless. Her Buckingham palace, which was built and is now kept up at a vast expense, contains innumerable suites of magnificent rooms, which are empty month after month and year after year. The queen during the last twenty years has resided there on an average for six nights in each year. The palace is open on four afternoons for drawing rooms, and on four evenings for the state balls and concerts.

A GENTLEMAN in Brussels claims to hav contrived a perpetual clock. It was started in the latter city about one year ago, and up to a recent date is said to hav been running perfectly. An up draught is obtained in a tube or shaft by exposing it to the sun. This draught turns a fan, which winds up the weight of the clock until it reaches the top, when it actuates a brake that stops the fan, but leaves it free to start again after the weight has gone down a little, and thus the power is stored for keeping the clock in motion.

HELEN WILMANS, whilom editor of Woman's World, holds singular views on the temperance question. She denies that saloons create a demand for strong drink; they simply supply what is demanded—demanded because "as the race refines and spiritualizes, as it is certainly doing, it calls for more stimulating and spiritualizing sentiment." She goes on to say that "there was an age when man lived on roots and berries, and when the ordinary contents of a modern cuisine would hav stimulated his feeble and animal brain to the verge of insanity."

AN Arkansas writer is amazed at the number of persons in his state who hav absolutely and persistently resisted every effort at progress. He adds that in southern and southeastern Arkanas are hundreds of farmhouses that hav not yet had a cooking-stove, and that a railroad surveyor tells him of many farmers who hav set their faces resolutely against railroads, on the ground that the locomotivs would scare game out of the country. A reporter of the New York Sun, who was recently in Arkansas, saw a farmer who was trying to sell out because a railroad is to be built within thirty miles of his farm.

A POSSIBLE topic at the present session of Congress will be the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians' lease of 3,117,800 acres of grazing land at two cents an acre. The syndicate which got the lease, which runs for ten years, hav just made the second half-yearly payment, aggregating over $31,000. Every man, woman, and child of both tribes was paid $5, the money being in $1 and $2 greenbacks. The next payment will be in cattle, as the lease calls for half money and half cattle. In the Indian territory it is believed that a number of United States senators and members of the House of Representativs are indirectly interested in the lease.

THE rain which dampened the festivities of Evacuation day in this city, and which drove President Arthur and most of the attending governors under cover, had no visible effect whatever upon the enthusiasm of Mr. Benjamin F. Butler. He kept his place on the reviewing stand regardless of the wet. This characteristic action of General Butler called forth the following poetic tribute from a Connecticut veteran:

"While other magnates on that famous day
Rode snug awhile, and then made haste away,
Ben Butler stood the pelting storm amid,
And faced the music, as he always did.
No wonder veterans, as along they came,
Made welkin echo with immense acclaim,
As they beheld, conspicuous o'er the scene,
That warrior governor at Bowling Green!
Aye, he with them had braved the storm before—
The leaden hail, the deep-mouthed cannon's roar,
The yell, the plunge, the clangor, and the jar,
The blood and thunder of horrific war!
Well might those cohorts shout: 'What boots the storm,
This day illustrious, while our hearts are warm?—
This day centennial of a nation's power—
Could ye not tarry with us for an hour?'
All praise anew to those intrepid men,
And leal commander, comrade—glorious Ben!"

AT Frauenburg, Prussia, Copernicus may be said to hav first begun systematically to note and record the places of the heavenly bodies. He chose for his observatory and abode a tower still pointed out to visitors as the "curia Copernicana." It formed part of the fortifications by which the ecclesiastical citadel of Ermland was (as the event proved) not altogether ineffectually protected, and overlooked a spacious horizon to the north, south, and west. The cathedral of Frauenburg stood on a gentle eminence close to the Frische Haff, and it was here that Copernicus set up his triquetrum, an instrument for taking the altitudes of the stars, constructed by himself, according to Ptolemaic precepts, of three strips of deal marked in ink with numerous divisions. Aided by this rude implement, which afforded, with the utmost care, a degree of accuracy at least 2,400 times inferior to that at the command of modern astronomers, he effected the most complete and surprising scientific revolution known in the history of human progress. It was soon discovered, however, that he possessed other gifts besides those necessary for star-gazing, and that his clear judgment and strong sense could be made eminently useful in practical affairs. He was at once bailiff, military governor, judge in civil and criminal cases, of first instance and of appeal, tax collector, vicar-general. Some records of his daily labors in the allotment of lands hav been preserved, and show the minuteness of the details with which he was obliged to be conversant. The conditions of tenure in Ermland were various and complicated. The difficulties at the best of times attending their regulation were increased tenfold by the disturbed state of the country.—Edinburgh Review.

THE poet Whittier, in a recent interview, said that Hawthorne, Emerson, Longfellow, and himself had always been friends. There were no jealousies, and each took a pride in the work and successes of the others. They would exchange notes upon their productions, and if one saw a kindly notice of the other it was always cut out and sent to him. Hawthorne was regarded by the others as the greatest master of the English language. Whittier describes himself as unlike the others, for he never had any method. When he felt like it he wrote, and neither had the health nor the patience to revise his work afterward. It usually went as it was originally completed. Emerson wrote with great care, and would not only revise his manuscript carefully, but frequently reword the whole on the proof sheets. Longfellow, too, was a very careful writer. He would lay his work by and then revise it. He would often consult with his friends about his productions before they were given to the world. "I was not so fortunate," says the Quaker poet. "I hav lived mostly a secluded life, with little patience to draw upon, and only a few friends for associates. What writing I hav done has been for the love of it. I hav ever been timid of what I hav penned. It is really a marvel to me that I hav gathered any literary reputation from my productions." Of Walt Whitman he remarks: "As I only read books to get the good out of them, I am not a critic, and I hav lived too long to quarrel with a man over his idiosyncrasies. I found some very strong things in Mr. Whitman's book."

THE religious crank turns up ever and anon. The New York Sun of a recent date relates that a number of women and girls ran out of a dry-goods store in Broadway yesterday afternoon, and a policeman ran in to see what was the matter. He arrested a wild-looking man who was hobbling around with an ornamental walnut crutch. The man wore a large red carriage robe, a blue worked Scotch bonnet, in which a small flag was stuck, and blue goggles. Around his neck was a tape measure, from which a clothespin dangled. One of his arms was enveloped in straw, like a champagne bottle or a rose-bush. His light beard and hair were long and unkempt. He said he was willing to go with the policeman, although he believed his arrest was illegal. He said that he was Albert Rosmore. He was asked why he had put on so uncommon clothes, and he said it was a "card" for his business, the nature of which he refused to disclose. "Why do you wear that tape measure and clothespin?" asked the justice. "That represents what the millionaires would wear in place of watches and chains, if they paid their debts," said the man, in a thin, shrill voice. After a moment's silence, he suddenly burst forth with: "Monopoly, extortion, and death reign supreme. Order has gone out of the world, for the world will not listen to the teachings of Moses. We are corrupt from here to China." "What would Moses do if he were living now?" asked the justice. "What would he do? He would fold the drapery of his couch about him and lie down to pleasant dreams, not deeming such a world worthy his thought." As Mr. Rosmore said this he folded his red robe around him dramatically. Then he began a speech in defense of Mormonism, and was committed for examination as to his sanity. As he was led out of the court-room he said: "Don't let me go to the island. Send me to Elmira Reformatory for ninety-nine years. I want to investigate its corruption. If I am sent to the island, I will reduce the city to ashes. Remember the fire at the Windsor Theater!"

No reliable clue has been discovered to the murderers of either the Maybee women, of Brookville, L. I., or of Phœbe Paullin, of Orange, N. J. The Rose Ambler murder at Stratford, Conn., has settled into an unsolvable mystery. His exposers state that the false beard, wig, and white robe fell off and revealed the medium. He was locked up charged with obtaining money under false pretenses.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

This is the radical error of Mr. Andrews's procedure. He does not undertake to prove the existence of general analogy by particular analogy, but particular analogy by general analogy; that is, he is entirely deductive, and not inductive. He is Platonic, and not Baconian. Let him first of all be inductive, and it strikes me that it will take his lifetime and several more to gather together enough particular analogies to prove the general analogy. Until this induction is made, Universology is only a grand guess. It may be a right guess, for Mr. Andrews is a Yankee of the Yankees, and is a splendid guesser; he is full of New England shrewdness; but to guess is one thing, and to demonstrate is another. Science does not guess, it demonstrates; at least, every guess must be assured by a most rigid verification. Newton was not satisfied with a mere guess of gravitation; he would not admit this general truth, except by a thorough appeal to particular facts. He said if gravitation is true, a particular fact will happen; if that particular fact does not happen, then gravitation is not the law of the universe. The particular fact did happen, and gravitation received its crowning demonstration. Darwin did not merely guess the "Origin of Species." He gathered a multitude of particulars through many patient years before he granted the truth of his general conclusions. Has Universology, the most general of all "guesses," been backed up by such an array of particulars? I must confess that I do not see it. Men of genius say that Universology is true, but they do not demonstrate it to my five senses. They may have a sixth sense, and see things that I can't see. They may see by a flash of intuition that this general principle is altogether right, but I must travel by the slow process of induction. I must come to Universology as Newton came to gravitation, and Darwin to his doctrine of evolution—by a grouping together and analysis of ten thousand particulars. No one will dispute Universology when it has received so rigid a demonstration, but to assume it as a general, and then reason to particulars, does not prove its truth, although some particulars may be thus explained. The Ptolemaic system of the universe, as a general principle, explained many of the motions of the heavenly bodies; but that did not make it true. It is very easy to assume a general truth, and so explain some particulars, but, for all that, science will not approve of the method, however brilliant the apparent result. Science says induction first, and then deduction; work from particulars to generals; and not until the general is fully established have we a right to reason from it to a particular. I do not see that Universology has yet been proved inductively, and therefore I do not feel justified in using it deductively, but only as a piece of sublime and fascinating guess-work. Will Mr. Andrews's disciples—instead of merely asserting the truth of Universology, and pointing out certain explanations which it makes of some phenomena, a feat which the old Ptolemaic system frequently did—will these disciples please show me the multitude of particulars from whence this general is derived? I am perfectly willing to accept Universology as an hypothesis—a very good and very helpful hypothesis—but I cannot grant that it is anything more. Mr. Andrews's reasoning is simply philosophical; that is, it is entirely deductive. He assumes universal analogy, and then proceeds to apply it; and he does this in many cases very beautifully and wisely—in music, for instance, it seems to find a wonderful illustration—but this does not prove the truth of Universology, for I maintain that no general truth whatever can be demonstrated by deduction—only by induction.

No general truth can be seen directly for the reason there are no general ideas in the mind—only particular ideas. There is no general idea of a horse or of a man—but only a particular idea. Think horse, and you must think a particular horse; think man, and you must think a particular man. You can't think of a general man. So with everything in the universe; we know it through its particular image, and not by a general conception. We generalize, but we do so in words, and not in ideas. Thinking or imaging—and all thinking is imaging—is done in particulars, not in generals. Therefore the mind having no general ideas can see directly no general truth. It must attain to them through a collocation of particulars.

Kant speaks of the necessary "forms" of thought. He says the human mind must think in such and such terms or channels because it is so constituted to think. For instance, it must think in the terms of time and space. Kant is partly right; the mind must think as it does, but the mistake of Kant is in asserting that this necessity of thought is subjective, as if the human mind were a separate entity from nature, had its form independent of nature, and came into nature and accepted nature only in its own supernatural molds. Now the mind of man does not impose these necessary forms on nature, but nature imposes these forms on the mind because the mind is the product of nature. Man is compelled to think as he does, not simply because the mind is as it is, but because the universe is as it is. The necessity is objective, and therefore the forms of human thought are true, not for man only, but for all the universe. Our subjective interpretation of things is not merely a reflection or inference from our personality—it is a genuine vision of the reality. Mr. Andrews is too deep and keen a thinker not to affirm, as I affirm, the objectivity of relations. Kant and almost all metaphysicians declare them subjective—true for us, but not necessarily true otherwise. They say that time and space are not objective realities, but merely subjective forms. I affirm, however, that time and space are objective realities; they are relations that exist outside of us. If all mind should be swept out of existence, still time and space would be—succession and co-existence. We think these relations, because they are in the total universe itself, and not simply in our minds. Mill affirms that two and two might make five in some other planet or state of condition than our own. This is carrying "subjectivity of relations" to an absurd extent. Two and two make four everywhere. The whole is greater than a part everywhere. These are objective truths existing entirely independent of the mind of man—true before man came into existence, and true when man ceases to be. Both things and relations are objective, and we see and know them outside, and not merely parts of ourselves.

So much as to reasoning; a few words as to classification of knowledge. Mr. Andrews seems to think that in and through classification there is an increase of knowledge, or that something is added to the quality of our knowledge. This I deny. The amount of knowledge is no greater after classification than before. We do not really know any more, only we know more distinctly. We have clarified our knowledge—sifted it. We know better what we know; or rather, we come to a knowledge of our knowledge, and that is a very important matter. The trouble with most people is that they don't know what they know. They mix knowledge and belief in a sad fashion. Because they believe a thing utterly, they imagine, therefore, that they know it. But believing is one thing and knowing is another. Man believes anything and everything, but he knows but very few things. In matters of knowledge there is no difference. It is the beliefs of people that separate. It is a splendid thing, therefore, to acquire a certainty of our knowledge—this is science; this is classification. But this does not really increase our knowledge. Sensation, I say, is the sole origin of knowledge and the constant producer of knowledge. Classification is not creation.

A little explanation as to mathematics. Mathematics is the science of relations and not of things, and its study may increase our knowledge of relations, but it cannot increase our knowledge of things. We may by a study of pure relation amplify our knowledge of relations, and in this respect I would modify my former statement that mathematics is poetry. It is science so far as relation is concerned, but it is poetry so far as things are concerned. In this respect it deals with an ideal world, a world of imagination, but in the relation of things it gives science, and so, we might say, do all poets. The true poet adheres always to the truth of relation; it is in things wherein his imagination builds. Every poet is a most exquisite mathematician, in that he is ever exact to the realities of relation, even in his most fantastic flights. So are the musician and the artist. In this sense we might say that mathematics is the very heart of poetry—and of science too; for a knowledge of relations is necessary to an extended knowledge of things; but how meager that man's knowledge would be who simply knew relations, and had but little acquaintance with things! Mathematics, as the science of relation, is simply a possibility; but when mathematics is translated in mechanics, and the world of things is taken hold of, what glorious achievements shine forth!

Let it also be understood that science is universal and not individual. Nothing can be declared scientific unless it can be testified to by that which is common to every mind. Science is not aristocratic—it is democratic. It does not believe in any "sixth" sense, only in the five senses. If one has a "sixth" sense, and happens to discover a truth that nobody else can discover for want of this exceptional faculty, that truth must remain an individual perception. It cannot be a scientific truth. As Thomas Paine said of "revelation," so of any experience that is purely exceptional. It cannot be accepted by the world until it has received demonstration in and through the senses which belong to all. If one's experience cannot be thus vindicated, it must be repudiated by science. If one has a "truth" discovered by some peculiar faculty, he must enjoy that truth all to himself and make the most of it. He cannot thrust it, by his mere mere "say-so," into the domain of science. Nothing can come into science but what is patent to man's universal reason.

Truth is truth the world over. If one is ever so positive that he has seen a "ghost," science will not admit it until the ghost can be produced and experimented upon, like any fact; and if it cannot stand the test of the five senses, then it cannot pass muster. Science says that what one man knows, every man can also know by the exercise of his ordinary abilities. Science is common sense absolutely. It is not un-common sense. There is really no such thing. All sense is common sense. If it is not common, it is not sense, but nonsense. Peculiar and exceptional experience must go to the limbo, like the old-time "revelations." They are of the same sort. They are merely "may-be's," and such "bees" produce no honey for human use. There is no extraordinary tribunal. Science has no "star-chamber." Huxley and Darwin have to appeal for the demonstration of their highest truth to the same faculties that the simplest reasoner does; knowledge all comes by the one process. There is no royal road, and no by-path. The way is open to everybody; and the wisest man can only more keenly trace what rudely strikes the common vision. The profoundest discovery can be made apparent to any man who has the faculties of a man.

Let me now repeat the steps that I hav gone over, in order that we may have a bird's-eye view of the pathway of science. First, we have the objective, material universe as the beginning and end of all. Secondly, in that universe is the mind of man, a process, and not a thing, resultant from certain conditions of matter. Thirdly, the universe impresses itself upon the mind of man, in and through some one of the five senses. Instantaneously with this outward impression is an inward sensation and perception, a sensation of the thing and a perception of relation, but, with this inward or subjective motion and seeing of the mind, is involved a direct cognition of the objective as real; the objective, simply as objective, is not an inference, but is absolute knowledge—and the most absolute knowledge of which the mind is capable. One knows the outward reality with the same certainty and immediateness that he knows himself.

Upon the basis of impression, sensation, and perception, the mind begins to reason, first concerning particulars, and then from particulars to generals, and no general truth is ever ascertained except through particular truths. There must be induction before deduction, and philosophy must be founded upon science, and any philosophy which cannot be demonstrated inductively cannot be accepted as scientifically true, no matter how beautifully it may display itself deductively. Its de-duction in that case is simply se-duction. After however, we have attained general truth by severity of induction, then deduction comes magnificently into use, and through it the mightiest triumphs of the human mind are achieved, and the crown of truth placed on man's brow; and poetry and art begin their splendid careers.

Of course many will be dissatisfied with this solution of the universe. It is not big enough for them. Well, it may be narrow and small, but it is exceedingly precious and useful. It is knowledge—it is not mere belief, or what one thinks. There is vast confusion in this matter. People confound belief with knowledge, and they really don't know what they do know. Let us stand by the actual truth, no matter how little it appears. It is infinitely better than a thousand unsubstantial beliefs, however beautiful and glowing. Because a faith is intense, that does not make it true. That only is true which can be demonstrated by scientific methods. Beyond that, all is guess-work and imagination. I believe most heartily in guess-work and imagination, only I desire that they be truly understood as such and not be smuggled in as realities. Let them pay duty every time—the tariff of common sense—and a hundred per cent at that. Better have a few goods, and the genuine article, than a host of splendid things that vanish with the clouds. Let us sift our opinions by universal reason, and stand by the demonstration furnished by the common capacities of the race. Better a few feet of solid ground than a million acres of cloudland. Better a little world where we can have railroads, and telegraphs, and steamships, and houses, and food, than a transcendental palace of star worlds, when we constantly tread on nothing, and the "thingness of the here" vanishes into the desert of the nowhere.

The sentimentalist, of course, opposes the scientific solution of the universe, because it seems to militate against his egoistic desire. We are prone to think that the mind is the grandest thing in the universe, simply because the ego is a mental fact. But we are not to judge things simply from our standpoint. The universe was not made for us; we are only a part of its onward and majestic movement. Still our minds are not any the less glorious because they spring from the immense potencies of matter. For in the first place we know not what matter is in all its sweep of power. We have not yet penetrated the secret of its enormous life. It is by no means that dull stuff that the transcendentalist talks about, the mere shadow of his egoism. It is an infinite magnificence, a reality, a motion, and a joy most wonderful —most wonderful because the mind of man is but a wave on the bosom of its suberb activities. It does not diminish at all the glory of mind that it is the product of the material universe. Its action is what it is, no matter whence its source. The flower springs from the dung-hill, and is just as beautiful as though it sprang from the bosom of a star. It is the living splendor that attracts and enchants; and so it is with the mind of man. It is the action, the movement, that is so lustrous, and that luster could not be any greater if made by an infinite god. We cannot change the limits of mind, nor can we alter the eternal truth of nature, and the mind must be judged and wear its crowns of honor, not for any fancied ornament of ancestry, but for the deeds it does now, the intensity and breadth of its action, the marvelousness of its being.

Beauty is beauty still, though the mind passes but for a moment over the varied face of nature. The mountains, and the forests, and the seas, and the sky, and the sun and the stars, lose nothing of their fascination. Still the great feelings of love and awe and reverence swell within. Still the soul beats with high resolve and noble endeavor; for what is in the mind of man of supreme power comes not from his conception of things, but from things themselves, from the mightiness of all that is. The dream of immortality may never cease to be; it may haunt the life of man, the flame-tip of his eager aspirations; but far better is it to devote ourselves to this living world.

We must pass from transcendental conceits into absolute submission to the reality of things. In obedience to the truth we shall find the supremacy of our being.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Paul's Speech before Agrippa.

If Paul ever delivered a speech before a dignitary named Agrippa, it was Marcus Vispanius Agrippa, who was born 63 B.C. and died 12 B.C. He was the inseparable friend of the emperor Augustus and one of his chief ministers. He was especially friendly to the Jews. Herod the Great entertained him at Cesarea and other cities of Palestine. At Jerusalem Agrippa offered a hecatomb of sacrifices to God and feasted the people (Jos. Ant. xvi, 2, § 1). He visited the cities of Asia, and relieved the Jewish inhabitants from the impositions of the Greeks. He issued edicts in behalf of the Jews, of which the following is a specimen:

"Agrippa, to the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, sendeth greeting: I will that the care and custody of the sacred money that is carried to the temple of Jerusalem be left to the Jews of Asia, to do with it according to their ancient custom; and that such as steal that sacred money of the Jews and fly to a sanctuary, shall be taken thence and delivered to the Jews by the same law that sacrilegious persons are taken thence. I hav also written to Sylvanus the pretor, that no one compel the Jews to come before a judge on the Sabbath day" (Jos. Ant. xvi, 6, § 4).

We hardly venture to suspect that this pretor of Ephesus was Paul's early associate Silvanus, who preached in Corinth (2 Cor. i, 19) and joined the apostle in the two letters to the Thessalonians. But it is by no means impossible that Silvanus (alias Silas, of Acts) quit preaching and became a pretor.

The rights of the Jews of Ephesus, granted by Agrippa, were confirmed by the proconsul Julius Antonius a few years later (Ibid, § 7).

"And Agrippa said to Paul: Thou are permitted to speak in thy own behalf. Then Paul extended his hand and made defense saying: In regard to all the things of which I am accused by the Jews, King Agrippa, I consider myself highly favored that I may this day make defense before thee; especially as I know thee to be expert in all the controversies and laws of the Jews. I therefore request thee to hear me with indulgence" (xxvi, 1–3).

If Paul's appeal to Cæsar was already allowed, what sense was there in a further hearing before a petty king who had no jurisdiction of the case? Nor was Agrippa II. a competent judge of Jewish law. But Marcus Agrippa was not only learned in the law, but the very person prior to 12 B.C. before whom Paul might hav had a hearing with reasonable hope of a just judgment. And this Agrippa was in that region before 20 B.C. as governor. Josephus says that he was sent to succeed Cesar in the government of the countries beyond the Ionian sea soon after Zenodorus was deprived of his principality, which lay between Trachon and Galilee, and was bestowed on Herod. Now Zenodorus lost his principality about 24 B.C. and died 20 B.C. It was therefore between these two dates that Agrippa was sent to succeed Augustus Cæsar in the government of the east; and that he was an activ governor is attested by Josephus, who says that the prisoners who were "delivered up by Agrippa were not punished by Herod, . . . who appeared almost inexorable in punishing crimes in his own family, but very generous in remitting the offenses that were committed elsewhere" (Ant. xv, 10, § 2–3). The political power of this distinguished official is also affirmed by Josephus in these words:

"There were but two men that governed the vast Roman empire; first Cæsar and then Agrippa, who was his principal favorit. Cæsar preferred no one to Herod besides Agrippa; and Agrippa made no one his greater friend then Herod, besides Cæsar" (Ibid., § 3).

Marcus Agrippa returned to Rome after 20 B.C., but went again to Asia 17 or 16 B.C., and was entertained by Herod in his new-built cities (Ant. xvi, 2, § 1). Smith's Bible Dictionary makes M. V. Agrippa governor of Syria 15 to 11 B.C., but other authorities say he died 12 B.C.

The speech of Paul before Agrippa continues as follows:

"The Jews themselvs, if they would testify, know well my course of life from my childhood, which from the beginning was among my nation and in Jerusalem. For they hav long been persuaded of me, and hav known that I lived in the princely (Gr. most rigid) doctrin [or sect] of the Pharisees. And now for the hope of the promis which was made by God to our fathers, I stand and am judged. To this hope our twelve tribes hope to come, with earnest prayers by day and night. And for this same hope, King Agrippa, I am accused by the Jews. How judge ye? Are we not to believe that God will raise the dead? For I myself at first resolved in my own mind that I would perpetrate many adverse things against the name of Jesus the Nazarean. Which also I did at Jerusalem; and by the authority I received from the chief priests I cast many of the saints into prison; and when they were put to death by them, I took part with those that condemned them [Gr. gave a vote against them]. And in every synagog I tortured them, while I pressed them to become revilers of the name of Jesus. And in the great wrath with which I was filled against them, I also went to other cities to persecute them" (4–11).

The Syriac version alone, so far as we are aware, has "revilers of the name of Jesus." The Greek has simply "to blaspheme." The part which Paul took, or the vote he gave, against the saints, or holy ones, is supposed to imply that he was a member of the Sanhedrin.

We now skip what Paul says about the journey to Damascus, etc. (12–21), which has been given in a previous article in parallel with the prior account of the same.

"But unto this day God hath helped me; and lo, I stand and bear testimony to the small and to the great; yet saying nothing aside from Moses and the prophets, but the very things which they declared were to take place, namely, that Messiah would suffer and would become the first fruits of the resurrection from the dead; and that he would proclaim light to the people and to the gentiles. And when Paul had extended his defense thus far, Festus cried out with a loud voice: Paul, thou art deranged; much study hath deranged thee. Paul replied to him: I am not deranged, excellent Festus, but speak words of truth and rectitude. And King Agrippa is also well acquainted with these things; and I therefore speak confidently before him, because I suppose not one of these things hath escaped his knowledge; for they were not done in secret. King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest. King Agrippa said to him: Almost thou persuadest me to become a Christian" (22–28).

This word Christian is certainly spurious, as we hav proved in regard to the same word in Acts xii, 26.

The Greek for "almost" is en oligo, which means literally "in little." Hence it is not surprising to find the clause translated differently in different versions, thus:

Vulgate or Douay.	Revised New Testament.
"A little thou persuadest me to become a Christian."	"With but little persuasion thou wouldst fain make me a Christian."

"And Paul said: I would to God that not only thou, but likewise all that hear me this day, were almost and altogether as I am aside from these bonds. And the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and those who sat with them. And when they had gone out they conversed with one another and said: This man hath done nothing worthy of death or of bonds. And Agrippa said to Festus: The man might be set at liberty if he had not announced an appeal to Cæsar" (29–32).

Again we say that Agrippa II. had no jurisdiction at Cesarea or even in Jerusalem. When his father, Agrippa, died, A.D. 44, his kingdom was equal in extent to that of Herod the great. But the son, being only seventeen years of age, was too young to be intrusted with the government of all Jewry. Therefore Claudius sent Cuspius Fadus to be procurator of the entire kingdom (Ant. xix, 9, § 2; War. ii, 11, § 6). But when Herod, king of Chalcis, died, A.D. 48, the emperor bestowed that little mountain kingdom upon his nephew Agrippa (Ant. xx, 5, § 2; War. ii, 12, § 1). Four years later, A.D. 52 or 53, Claudius took away from him the kingdom of Chalcis, but gave him the tetrarchies of Philip and Lysanias, embracing Auranitis, Batanea, Trachonitis, and Abila, all on the other side of Jordan (Ant. xx, 7, § 1). At the beginning of Nero's reign, A.D. 54, four cities with their toparchies were added, one of which was Tiberias in Galilee; but over the rest of Judea, says Josephus, Felix was made procurator (War. ii, 13, § 2). At the outbreak of the war, A.D. 66, Agrippa made a speech in Jerusalem begging the Jews not to resist the Romans. A full report of it is given by Josephus, but Dr. Whiston concedes that it is the "elegant composure" of the historian (War. ii, 16). After its delivery both the speaker and his sister Bernice wept. But it was all in vain; the people stoned Agrippa out of town, and he "retired to his own kingdom" (17 § 1–2). Josephus and Agrippa were great friends, and Canon Farrar calls them both renegades. Josephus boasts of having received sixty-two letters from Agrippa, two of which, in praise of his history, he reproduces (Life, § 65). At the siege of Gamala, Agrippa was hit on the elbow with a stone from a sling, which greatly enraged his friends, the Roman soldiers. But he survived the war and ended his days at Rome A.D. 100.

King Agrippa II. never sat as judge at Cesarea, either in the case of Paul or any other prisoner of Judea. But it is possible that Paul had a hearing before Marcus Vispanius Agrippa some time between 22 and 12 B.C. and that Bernice, who was married to Herod's son Aristobulus about 17 B.C. (Ant. xvi, 1, §2), listened to the apostle's speech. As to the time when this occurred, if at all, we incline to the earliest possible data, 22 B.C., when Paul was about 74 years of age. It seems improbable that he sailed to Rome after the age of 80.

Common Sense on the Polygamy Question.

From the Sunday Mercury.

If ever this republic comes to grief it will be by the hands of men, supplemented by strong-minded women, who are utterly ignorant of the intent and genius of our institutions. No greater necessity exists than the teaching in the public schools of the constitution of each state and the Federal Constitution, to the end that the coming generations, unlike the present, shall know what Madison and Hamilton meant when they defined the limitations of the Washington government. As an example of the ignorance which leads to a grave attempt to centralize power at the federal seat, the "National League for the Suppression of Polygamy" met and organized at Cleveland, Ohio, Thursday last, and recommended as a new movement the circulation of a petition asking the coming Congress to pass and send to the states for ratification an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting polygamy. The amendment, on its face, would be a libel on the existing states, for in every one of them plural marriages are punished as illegal and atrocious. But the memorialists argue that such an amendment would apply to the territories when they become states, and thus Mormon polygamy would be crushed out in Utah, New Mexico, and Montana. Congress has now certain power over the territories. That power is not supreme, for when Congress agreed to their organization as territories, or inchoate states, gave them local legislatures, suffrage so far as the selection of legislativ members and minor judicial officers is concerned, and trial by jury, it parted with all of its authority save the appointment of governors and supreme court judges, and the ownership of public lands. Congress has no more power to relegate a territory to its primal or chaotic condition than to relegate a state to a territorial status. Once a territory always a territory, unless admitted as a state. It is for this reason Congress finds itself at a loss to deal with the Mormons so long as those fanatics are in a majority in Utah. That body, at every step, is hampered by a people whose local government is one of partial sovereignty. The National League for the Suppression of Polygamy should wrestle with the Mormon women instead of pestering Congress with a petition for an absurd amendment. Every Mormon female believes that no one at the day of resurrection can remove the black cloth which the Mormon priest lays over her face when she is buried, but a husband. If the sable shroud is not withdrawn on the final day of accounts, she will sleep forever. This belief makes her obedient to the husband and respectful to his other wives. The league should set about dissipating that awful superstition, and there would soon be a decrease in polygamic unions. Congress has no power to legislate on the subjects of monogamy or of polygamy. The states control the marriage relation, and Congress, having surrendered to the territories the right, not the privilege, of legislating for themselvs, has no business with the marriage tie within their limits. Every good citizen abhors polygamy, but to still further doctor the Federal Constitution with amendments is quite as much to be abhorred. The trouble over the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments has proven the expediency of letting that instrument alone. The Federal Supreme Court has begun the work of decentralization. The best method of killing any humbug, whether social or religious, is to let it alone. Mormonism was dying out when unnoticed, but organized crusades against it made the priesthood activ, and missionaries were sent to Europe to proselyte and ship immigrants hither. Other missionaries are laboring with success in the backwoods of Georgia and North Carolina. Persecute any set of religionists and they will prosper. Cease to do it, and the fanatical sect will relax their exertions and eventually make no progress.

A Card from Mr. Lacy.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would state, in justification of my friend Mr. Truesdell, author of "Bottom Facts," that his objections to signing the first contract I sent him being quiet reasonable, I drew another making some changes. This also, proving not quite satisfactory to him, he wrote one, making some modifications, signed, and sent it to me. This has some slight features not acceptable to me, but I think we shall be able to fix the matter for the test after a while. Trust to hav means at hand to fill the requisitions on my part by time satisfactory arrangements can be consummated.

Nirvana, Nov. 19th. FRANCIS D. LACY.

The Attitude of Unbelief.

The discoveries and inventions of the present century, wonderful in themselvs, are wonderful in the changes they hav produced. The application of steam and electricity, the growth of the printing-press, hav enormously accelerated intellectual and material progress, while the prosecution of scientific research has resulted in the revolutionizing of thought. The age is intensely practical, progressiv, and impatient of obstruction. The spread of knowledge by innumerable means has given an immense stimulus to original inquiry and independent thinking. Old creeds and systems hav now to confront not here and there an isolated reformer, but an awakened world.

The matter for the churches is one more serious than they affect to believe. "Sire, it is not a revolt; it is a revolution." They can no longer superciliously dub the Infidel a "scoffer," an indecent railer at holy things; they find themselvs in the face of an army of earnest thinkers determined to ascertain and publish the truth—truth seekers whom no sham will bedazzle, no subterfuge satisfy.

The startling results of scientific investigation quickly popularized hav had a killing effect on superstition; but still the world has much to unlearn, as well as to learn. Most men who hav passed through the phases of emancipation from traditional belief must hav been impressed with the vastness of the change that has taken place in their habit and power of thought, and only such can realize the degree of hereditary paralysis that the old religious beliefs hav entailed on mankind. So great is the difference between the two states that it is safe to say a person brought up in an atmosphere of Liberalism cannot rightly estimate the mental condition of a "believer," and the latter has no adequate conception of a state of liberty. Sooner or later, however, the leaven is destined to spread; and it promises much for the cause of freedom that the doubts and questionings so fatal to "orthodoxy," that used to be introduced in a half surreptitious manner, are now freely admitted and discussed. They are recognized because they cannot be kept out. And the air is full of them.

Compared with one's natural conception of the universe and its plan, through his own perceptions, and in the light of science, the Biblical idea is singularly impoverished, narrow, and degrading. Besides this, to an unbiased and independent thinker, the Bible cannot answer the requirements of a divine revelation. A revelation worthy of a divine author ought to be confined to no period of history, and to no particular nation. It ought to come in a language, or vehicle, common to the race. In its terms and conditions it should be perfectly plain to all, resembling in that respect the instincts of nature. History or anecdote in such a revelation, if verbal, would not be expected; but should they occur, they should at least be authentic. Lastly, a revelation ought to bear such mark of authority as to carry instant and universal conviction.

Is it not a singular phenomenon that the so-called divine revelation in the Bible fails to satisfy anyone of these conditions? It is local as to time and place. It was not made until a time comparativly recent in the world's history, and the limited nature of its circulation, down to our own day, is notorious. Instead of being addressed in a language or form universally intelligible, the vehicle could not be more imperfect and cumbrous, its nativ defects aggravated by blunders of transcription and translation. What can we say of it as a systematic statement of God's will? Hardly anyone can fail to be struck with its utter lack of system. The Bible is a scrap-book, into which all sorts of material are thrown promiscuously, chapters of history, local anecdotes, precepts that hav survived their purpose, unintelligible prophecies, sentiments worthy only of a barbarian, and ridiculous stories mingling with oriental philosophy for the most part unpractical and visionary. Mark of authority it has none. The very names of the writers are mere guess-work, the books are in dispute, and the best confessedly picked out from a mass of rubbish by a "council." The fact that the majority of men instinctivly, if unconsciously, refuse to recognize the Bible as the message of God is strongly shown by the civil, courteous indifference with which most nominal Christians regard it. Practical unbelief can alone account for this neglect of so momentous a document. All of which is saying that the Bible as a revelation is nothing that it ought to be, and everything that it ought not to be.

But the candid inquirer meets with another class of difficulties, those concerning what is taught in the Bible. The "divine plan" is full of absurdities. The whole story of man's probation, fall, and redemption is as pueril as a nursery rhyme, and we might prolong the series of worn-out questionings on it to wearisome length. A different view of human responsibility from that of the Bible would upset the entire scheme. Are we so sure that man is a free agent, and, therefore, responsible? The strong arguments appear all on the other side. Liberty is simply the power to act as we will; but what if there be a something determining the action of the will itself? It is claimed that mind as well as matter can undergo no change which is not the result of an antecedent cause. The voyage of a feather or a flake through the air is governed by the sternest natural law; and why may not our inclinations be ruled by subtle influences? There are the hereditary ones, the climatic ones, the educational ones, and I could name a score of others. The external influences of the hour, and, internally, the principles and passions, by the balance of their respectiv forces, command the will, and the will dictates the act. Dr. Priestley says: "A man, when he reproaches himself for any particular action in his past conduct may fancy that if he was in the same situation again he would hav acted differently. But this is a mere deception, and if he examins himself strictly, and takes in all circumstances, he may be satisfied that with the same inward disposition of mind, and with precisely the same view of things that he had then, and exclusiv of all others that he has acquired by reflection since, he could not hav acted otherwise than he did." Spinoza says: "Men are deceived in thinking themselvs free—a belief which rests only on this, that, while they are conscious of their actions, they are ignorant of the causes by which they are determined." Admit this reasoning, as I think most persons will, on reflection, and what becomes of the popular notion of free will, and, if so, of that of sin and of reward and punishment? This subject is too intricate for present discussion, otherwise much might be said on it.

Without entering the maze of theology, one other point might be touched on—the exaggerated importance of the sentiment of love in the Christian system. The perfection of human nature must surely be the object of a god so anxious about the salvation of man, and yet we find in the Christian teachings little or no encouragement for man's intellectual growth, for the strengthening of those faculties which make men eminent in art, science, discovery, philosophy. There is an actual preference of ignorance to science, weakness to strength, and poverty to the subjection of nature to man's use; i. e., wealth in its legitimate sense. Man's higher development, in a wide and noble sense, the Christian system dwarfs down to the unintelligent culture of an ardent temperament.

Doubt, and finally unbelief, are further occasioned by all that the Christian ranks exhibit to-day. As Mr. F. A. Kidder well says in his current article on "Morality and Religion," "theology is in the rear, and not in the van." Judge Black's preposterous statement that the defense of theology is no business of the priests, seems almost a covert sneer at the weakness and helplessness of the appointed custodians of religion. Not fierce affirmation, nor labored, inconclusiv scholastic arguments, nor a yielding, accommodating Beecherism, nor the shouts and psalms of Moody and Sankeyism will satisfy the growing intelligence of the world. It wants facts, and will accept no substitute. In the countries most favorable, to use again Mr. Kidder's words, "the church is losing its hold on the convictions of men, and on the conscience of the community;" while in missionary fields, as India for instance, as compared with other proselyting systems, Christianity is "nowhere."

Who will deny that the attitude of the unbeliever is reasonable? He has the honesty to speak his thought, the courage to disavow all false hopes, the earnestness to pursue inquiry to its farthest limit, and to be unsatisfied with specious argument. Is not this a religion in itself—one ten times more worthy than lazy, unquestioning faith and hysterical emotion? And who can conceive of any God who could condemn such an attitude? ROUNDHEAD.

Mr. Watts on Liberalism in the United States.

From the Secular Review.

For some weeks past it has been my desire to write fully upon my impressions of Freethought and its propagandism in America; but the heavy labor involved in lecturing most evenings and traveling night and day has hitherto prevented me carrying out that desire. For the present, therefore, I must content myself with sending a few notes, to assure my personal friends and the general readers of the Secular Review that I am not only alive and well, but fairly activ in the lecturing field. It would be almost impossible to mention accurately the many thousand miles over which I hav traveled since landing in New York on the 29th of August last. Perhaps some vague idea may be formed of the distances that I hav gone when it is known that my tour has included visits to the states of New York, Wisconsin, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio, Indiana, and also Canada. I hav lectured in the following cities: Rochester, Milwaukee, Racine, Waukegan, Chicago, Berlin, Fon du Lac, Wausau, Kalamazoo, Union City, Sturgis, Independence, Sioux City, Fremont, What Cheer, Creston, Huntingdon, Toronto, Montreal, Welland, and Hamilton. Before returning to England I hav now over fifty engagements to fulfil in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Massachusetts, New York, and in Canada. Thus it will be seen that American friends are determined that I shall not be idle during my sojourn with them; and it is most gratifying to me to be assured of their appreciation of my humble efforts by several urgent invitations being given me to permanently locate on American soil. An exceedingly tempting engagement for a four months' lecturing tour, to commence next January, has just been proffered me. At present I am undecided as to its acceptance, on account of my business arrangements in England.

Connected with my present visit to this grand and apparently inexhaustible continent there are many pleasant associations and interesting incidents. Among the former is the fact that, in nearly all my peregrinations, I hav been accompanied by Mr. George Chainey, a gentleman whom to know is to admire. His frank, honest, and genial nature is only equaled by his cultured and refined mind. Destitute of all egotism, and a determined foe of both private and public despotisms, he is one whose friendship is valuable, and whose society will always be congenial to the intellectual and moral student. I thoroughly indorse Colonel Ingersoll's opinion when he wrote: "Mr. Chainey feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius." Mr. Chainey was for years a regularly-ordained Methodist preacher; but the intellectual poverty and mind-destroying creeds of that body afforded him no scope for his yearnings for mental freedom. He therefore joined the Unitarian church; but even in this comparativly free atmosphere he found himself too much fettered by vague teachings as to the alleged supernatural, and ultimately the only resting-place he could find was the haven of Secularistic Freethought, which is guided by human experience and regulated by ethical purity.

In the United States there appears to me to be more Freethought than there is practical Secularism. This was manifested very clearly at the Milwaukee Convention. The majority of the speakers on that occasion failed to grasp the true idea of Secular organization. Freethought Associations, to be successful, must, of course, be destructiv; but they must also be constructiv. And until the relativ positions of these two aspects of our movement are understood and properly adhered to our organization will be impeded. It has been so in England, where the consolidation of the Secular forces has been greatly hindered through too little attention having been paid to positiv principles. People hav more knowledge as to what they should not do than as to what they should do. Freethinkers in the states are everywhere numerous. They are convinced of the folly and inutility of all theological teachings, and the great requirement of the time is to expound and enforce that science of life which "has no god but humanity, and no duty in this world but the perfection of the men and women in it."

In Canada clearer and truer conceptions of Secularism obtain. There the negativ and positiv features of Secular advocacy are wisely blended. The result is that the Dominion surpasses all other places that I hav visited for high-toned skepticism and the exemplification of the beneficial influence of Secular teaching on personal conduct.

It seems to me that this educational part of Secularism should be kept in view more than ever just now, when Freethought is progressing so rapidly in all circles of society. During my travels in America I hav been agreeably astonished at the amount of religious indifference and skepticism to orthodoxy which abound even within the prescribed folds of the church itself. There is, of course, plenty of apparently religious worship; but really Christianity has become in most of the states merely a commercial commodity. What does this fact denote? Why, that, if Freethought were fashionable, it would be found profitable by the public, and would then command adherents as readily as the profession of orthodoxy does to-day. The problem for solution is, What is the best way to make our views fashionable? The answer of all history and experience is, Make Secularism respected by keeping it intact from, and independent (from a true Secular standpoint) of, all objectionable and alien associations; thus it will win general assent, and become enshrined in the public mind. Sincerity will then take the place of profession, and conduct that of faith.

In Racine and other places I lectured in the Turner Hall. This is the name given to a large number of buildings to be found in American cities. They belong to the German organization, which has a membership throughout the states of seventeen thousand strong, all the members being Freethinkers, and the great majority avowed Atheists. Their leading paper is the Friedenker, published in Milwaukee. I had the pleasure of meeting the editor and proprietor, with whom I spent a few very pleasant hours.

At Chicago my lecture was most successful indeed. Professor Garrison, known to many friends in England, presided, and related events in my life which indicated that, when he was in the old country, he must hav watched my career closely. I hope to merit the kind and generous words he uttered as to my poor services in the cause of human progress.

THE TRUTH SEEKER management hav added a child's department to their already useful and popular journal, to be edited by the talented Miss Wixon, of Fall River, Mass., a lady of superior qualifications and attainments, an honor not only to Liberalism, but to her sex. We congratulate the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, together with its managers, in thus securing the services of Miss Wixon as editor of this much-needed department.—Liberal.

Editorial Notes.

THE Testimonial Fund for Messrs. Foote and Ramsey, the imprisoned editor and publisher of the London Freethinker, amounts to £156 11s. Mr. Ramsey was released on November 24th, his sentence having expired, but Editor Foote will not be liberated till spring.

IF "D. W. T.," of Boston, will send us his name and address, we will print his communication. Otherwise we can not, as our rule is not to print anonymous articles. It is not necessary that the name should be publicly used, but we must know who our correspondents are.

MESSRS. WATTS AND CHAINEY will lecture in Boston, at the Paine Memorial Hall, on Sunday, December 16th, morning, afternoon, and evening. Their engagement in this city is next Sunday evening, the 9th, at German Masonic Temple, 220 E. 15th street, at 8 P.M. Let everybody come and bring their friends. Those desiring to procure tickets in advance can do so by calling at this office.

WE regret to learn of the death of Paul Dillingham, of West Pawlet, Vt. He was for several years a hard laborer in the Freethought field, and although Vermont is steril territory to work in, he accomplished much good. He was a constant distributor of tracts and papers, and through him many were led to renounce superstition and enlist under the banner of Humanity. Would there were thousands like him!

IN his Thanksgiving sermon James Freeman Clarke scored General Butler rather roughly, calling him a "demagog," but giving utterance in the same sermon to sentiments more radical than ever fell from the lips of the hero of New Orleans. Mr. Clarke advocated the adoption of a system of taxation that will prevent the accumulation of immense fortunes, universal suffrage, and the passage of laws to impose a fine upon and disfranchise all who neglect to vote.

THE House of Representativs has appointed a Democratic chaplain, and his instructions to the Lord will of course be Democratic in their tendency. The Senate chaplain is a Republican, and his commands to Jehovah will be tinctured with Republicanism. The position of Jehovah is not enviable, as to earn the eighteen hundred dollars given them this session these two harpies must make their demands vociferously. The church works every possible source of revenue for all it is worth.

A CHURCH in the old town of Westmoreland, N. H., appeals through the New England Observer, for a minister. The conditions are that he shall be "young, smart, and willing to work." The kind of work is not specified, but probably the ability to milk a cow would be a desirable accomplishment. The New England people pay their preachers, on an average, more than ten dollars per week, and consequently demand the best article in the market. There is no reason why the pulpit of Westmoreland should not be filled by a smart and industrious youth.

IN view of the Independent's recent boast, the words of the Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, of the Madison Square Presbyterian church of this city, at the meeting of the New York Presbytery on the 20th ult., are significant. He told the assembled brethren that the Presbyterians were behind nearly all the other denominations in church and missionary work, and warned them to wake up. It was not so important, he said, that they should build new churches or repair decayed ones, as that they should make the gospel stronger in those that already existed.

MR. SAMUEL MORLEY, radical member of Parliament, and Positivistic Infidel, somewhat noted for spelling God with a small g, has contributed $25,000 to the movement to relieve the distress of the poor of London. Hereafter in the chronicles of the church it is probable that Mr. Morley will be set down as a Christian.

"But he who filches from me my good name,
Robs me of that which not enriches him."

Let the vigorous church romancers remember that.

BROTHER YORK'S "Notes from the Lecture Field" are pleasant reading. He has spent a good portion of the past year in traveling up and down the Pacific slope, and wherever he goes he does good. He found that portion of the million of the people of the United States graciously vouchsafed to the Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Jews, and Mormons by the Independent, living west of the Rockies, to be very much alive and making fully their share of noise in the religious world. We wish the eloquent and energetic doctor would take a trip East. For the good list of new subscribers he sends, he has our sincere thanks.

Two years ago the Washington Territory legislature passed a stringent Sunday law. Since then the people of the Territory hav become more enlightened and desire its repeal, but the bigots so far hav been enabled to defeat the Liberals. The last vote taken (Oct. 23d) resulted in a tie. The repeal bill will come up again, when its advocates hope for success. The Sunday law has not been respected and its provisions hav not been enforced, and its repeal is mainly desired as a vindication of the rights of conscience and to remove the possibility of annoyance and injustice being inflicted upon Liberal citizens by fanatical pietists. Sunday laws are a subversion of the spirit of our government, and, as one of the Washington Territory advocates of repeal (Mr. Kuhn) said, "make men feel more like American citizens for breaking." To the plea that they close the saloons and compel men to abstain at least one day in seven, the words of Mr. Kuhn may again be quoted as sufficient answer: "It is a question between a bottle for a dollar on Saturday night and a drink for ten cents on Sunday morning."

AN autograph collector of this city is about to publish a pamphlet containing the sentiments written to him by the distinguished individuals whose names he has collected. On one of the pages of his album is written this:

"It is far better to love your wife than to love God. You cannot help him, but you can help her. You can fill her life with the perfume of perpetual joy. It is better to love your child than to love Jesus Christ. If he is God you cannot assist him, but you can plant a flower in every footstep of a babe. The most sacred temple is a home, the holiest altar is the fireside. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

MR. LELAND'S history of the National Liberal League in the forthcoming "TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL" will alone be worth more than the twenty-five cents which the book will sell for. It is the first authoritativ summary of the leading events in the life of the League, and may be confidently referred to as containing the truth. So much has that organization been slandered by its enemies that we think this paper necessary to a complete understanding of the League's course. We are much encouraged by the assurances from all sides that the ANNUAL is a necessary work. The original contributions to it are all of sterling worth, and the selections are from the best Freethought literature in print. The Almanac is very full and complete.

PREACHING on the Mormons, Thanksgiving Day, Mr. Beecher said of them:

"There stands the phenomenon of the nineteenth century. What is its power? Wherein does it consist? What is it doing? It is a spiritual despotism—absolute. It is founded on fanaticism and ignorance—absolute. It is founded on a literal acceptance of the Old Testament. I don't see how a man who believes in verbal inspiration can throw stones at the Mormons. Are they polygamists? So is the Old Testament saint. What sort of a fellow was Solomon? In all his glory he was not arrayed like one of these. Mormonism in its religious philosophy is simply the attempt to reintroduce into modern economy the institutions and the beliefs of the Mosaic period of the Old Testament. They hav no gorgeous ceremonial. There are very few things that appeal to their imagination. And yet it is one of the most cohesiv bodies of men that exist."

THE way ministerial reformers are nowadays disposed of is thus told by Talmage:

"If the reformer be in the Methodist church his antagonists will try to get him appointed to some insignificant station on a small salary. If he be in the Baptist church his antagonists will try to hav him expelled from the association. If he be in the Congregational church they will call a council and will not invite him. If he be in the Presbyterian church they will try to grind him up between the Book of Disciplin and the Westminster Catechism. I am not so much opposed to one pope, if he be a good man, as I am to these scores of little popes all over Protestantism—Methodist popes, Baptist popes, Episcopalian popes, Lutheran popes, Congregational popes, Presbyterian popes—and I will say that in this country it takes less timber to make a pope than in any country in the world. But ever and anon some one arises and catches Luther's spirit, and there is another crash of consecrated humbugs. In the harness of the church there is too much breeching-strap and not enough traces."

SINCE Jan. 1, 1883, John E. Remsburg has traveled twenty-seven thousand miles. He has lectured in fifteen states, and despite wrecks, floods, snow-blockades, and sickness, has never in a single instance failed to reach his appointments on time. He is now at work in Texas. Of his lecture in Dallas the Dallas Herald of the 21st ult says:

"Mr. J. E. Remsburg of Atchinson, Kansas, delivered an eloquent lecture at Mayer's Hall last night on the life and character of Thomas Paine. The hall was fairly filled, and the frequent applause which greeted the speaker showed that he did justice to his subject and sustained the high reputation he has attained as a Freethought lecturer. He reviewed the life and public career of Thomas Paine as told by unbiased historians, dwelling with pathos and eloquence upon Paine's noble self-sacrifice for an unrequited devotion to humanity, his patriotism, charity, mercy, and love of truth; his moral courage in facing death itself rather than swerve from the path of duty, and his earnest upholding, under the most trying circumstances, the rights and liberty of man against the encroachments of tyrants."

FROM all indications it is apparent that friend Pritchard, who discovered gold in Montana, and communicated his discovery to the Liberal public through THE TRUTH SEEKER, is destined to be vindicated from the charge of dishonesty. We find a telegraph despatch in the New York World, headed "All Aboard for Bozeman!" and reading as follows:

"BOZEMAN, Mon., Nov, 28.—There is great excitement throughout Western Montana over rich mineral discoveries in the Cœur d'Alene Mountains. Prospectors who hav returned say that no mines hav ever been discovered in the history of the Western States or Territories equal to the newly discovered field. The minerals consist of silver, tellurium, and free milling gold, $100 per man per day being taken out of the rim rock of the gulches, while in the gulches $25 to $40 per day per man are being panned out. The streams are in the northern part of Idaho, near Eagle City, forty miles from Heron, on the Northern Pacific Railroad. There are now about 500 people in camp."

It will of course be a source of much gratification to our readers, as it is to ourselvs, to know that the first reports of Mr. Pritchard in THE TRUTH SEEKER hav been more than verified. If the mines continue to pan out according to sample, it would not be altogether inappropriate for those who are making fortunes out of them to meet together, and under the influence of the enthusiasm which the sudden acquisition of wealth inspires, christen this new Eldorado "The Pritchard Mine," or "The Truth Seeker Gold Fields." It would then be the duty of each individual attending the meeting, as well as of all other individuals, te send 25 cents to this office for "The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884," to be issued in a few weeks.

IT has been asserted by Mr. Bradlaugh's enemies that his popularity in the borough of Northamton has waned until he could not be again returned should a new election of members of Parliament be ordered. But at the last municipal election four men, who were all attacked by the Conservativs as friends of the Radical member, were victorious, and the Northampton Herald, the bitter foe of Mr. Bradlaugh, is so affected by the result that it petulantly cries, "As a rule, a candidate has but to be labelled 'Radical Bradlaughite,' and, were he the most incompetent noodle that ever breathed, he would figure as the representativ of the West Ward." In several cases lately the cry has been raised against candidates that they are supporters of Bradlaugh, but in each one the candidate has been elected. Mr. Bradlaugh has been granted a full court to hear the arguments in his suit against the House of Commons for illegally depriving him of his seat. One of the foremost movers in getting up the petition against Mr. Bradlaugh is now a fugitiv from justice, having run away with the funds of a bank of which he was sub-manager. Some of the money he stole was used to pay for the collection of signatures to the petition. He was particularly emphatic in his denunciation of what he was pleased to call Mr. Bradlaugh's "immoral Atheism." The London Times is disgracing itself by printing the most absurd statements about Mr Bradlaugh and then refusing him the use of its columns to deny them. His fight is very up-hill work, for while the Tories are constantly saying the government helps him, such is not the case. Gladstone does nothing. The Tories in the House subscribed heavily to help Mr. Newdegate, but the Liberal members did not advance to Mr. Bradlaugh the slightest aid. The cost of the struggle is borne by the Freethinkers, so far as they are able, but Mr. Bradlaugh has paid out this year about $2,000 more than the subscriptions received. He raises the money by lectures, some of which are very profitable, but he speaks at many meetings without receiving any pay. In the past three years he has attended some 150 gatherings free. There is not much prospect of the fight being ended for a long time. In connection with this fight the preachers of England are making great ado over the "saving" of Mr. Bradlaugh's brother. The facts of the case are that Mr. Bradlaugh has only one brother, W. R. Bradlaugh, who was never a Freethinker, or member of any Freethought society, or even an attendant at Freethought lectures. He was a member of the Church of England, from which, according to his own account, he was converted to his present faith, whatever that may be, by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. It is well to explode this story now, for it will be over on this side of the water soon.

THE gift of John Morley, of England, to the outcast of London has been approached in munificence by a generous Freethinker of Ontario. The necessity of a city hospital has been for some time apparent to the people of Brantford, who held a public meeting to consider the ways and means, at which a committee was appointed to inquire into the cost and report. At a session of the City Council of Brantford held on the 20th of November, Mr. John H. Stratford, a Freethinker, and one of the wealthiest of the Brantford citizens, made a proposition to build at his own expense, at a cost of $12,000, a city hospital, and deed it to the corporation. His proposition is set forth in the following communication to the mayor and aldermen:

"GENTLEMEN: I beg to submit the following offer for the consideration of your honorable body in reference to the establishment of a hospital, either within the limits of the city or on a suitable site adjacent thereto. At my own expense I will hav erected a proper building, to cost about $12,000, and when the same is finished deed it over to the city free of incumbrance and contribute toward its maintenance a yearly sum of $400, payable quarterly in advance, such payments to commence at its opening and continue for so long a time as I may elect. I would respectfully further submit the following conditions:

"1. That the management of the hospital shall be strictly non-sectarian in its character, and the institution be open to all citizens of this city, subject, of course, to the rules that may be laid down hereafter for its conduct. That no clergyman, priest, or member of a religious sect, secret or other society, shall hold religious or other services within its walls or grounds, except a patient shall request the attendance of such, and then only for that patient's personal benefit.

"2. That the buildings or grounds shall never be encumbered or mortgaged by any lien whatsoever, and if so encumbered or mortgaged will be forfeited at the option of myself or heirs.

"3. That the supervision of the affairs of the hospital shall be in the hands of five governors, two to be chosen by your body, one by the citizens, for such time and in such manner as may hereafter be arranged, myself being one for life, and having the right to nominate another, and at my death my heir to hav a right to nominate one, the council one, and the citizens two.

"4. That no emolument of any kind shall attach to the office of governor.

"5. That the buildings shall always be insured for a sufficient sum to replace them in case of their destruction by fire.

"6. The county of Brant to hav the privileges of the institution if the county council see fit to contribute toward its maintenance.

"7. The hospital to be called for all time 'The Stratford Hospital.'

"Should this proposition meet with your favorable consideration, I will visit with my achitect several hospitals and submit plans naming the site at an early day, when my proposal can be finally accepted or rejected, or by mutual consent amended.

"I hav the honor to be, gentlemen, yours faithfully,
"Brantford, Nov. 16, 1883. JOHN H. STRATFORD."

The council passed a vote of thanks to Mr. Stratford for his very liberal offer to the city, and intends to further confer with Mr. Stratford when the site and plans are submitted. When this splendid gift is accepted and the sick are enjoying its benefits, the church will probably smuggle into it a minister in the guise of a patient, send "an emisary in the night with a piece of chalk to write the word Christian over the door, and in the morning ask what Infidels hav ever done for charity."

Facts and Fallacies in Regard to the New Testament.—Continued.

"And was there until the death of Herod, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet saying: Out of Egypt hav I called my son" (Matt. ii, 15).

The prophecy quoted is Hosea xi, 1. "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt."

Referring to the deliverance of the children of Israel from Egypt in the days of Pharaoh, and charging them with ingratitude to God in turning away from him, and worshiping Baalim, as the context most plainly proves, the very next verse reads:

"As they called them, so they went from them; they sacrificed unto Baalim, and burned incense to graven images."

Turn to the account of the deliverance of the children of Israel, in Exodus, and we find God called Israel his son.

"And thou shall say unto Pharaoh: Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my first-born: and I say unto thee, Let my son go that he may serve me, and if thou refuse to let him go, behold I will slay thy son, even thy first-born" (Ex. iv, 22, 23).

Dear Christian friends, in all candor, truth, and honesty, if you found such perversion and false pretense in any other book, would you not spurn it and despise its writer? We hav always believed the birth of Christ was in exact fulfilment of the prophecy of the Old Testament. Yet when we fairly examin it, turning to the Bible itself for confirmation, we find only internal evidence that the New Testament lacks not alone divine inspiration, but truth; and the more we investigate, the more utterly unreliable it proves.

"Then Herod, when he saw that he was mocked of the wise men, was exceeding wroth, and sent forth and slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof, from two years old under, according to the time which he had diligently inquired of the wise men" (Matt. ii, 16).

No profane historian makes any illusion even to this most terrible massacre. Why is this? We hav very full histories of the life, times, acts, good and bad, of Herod; his barbarity when he was about to die; his attempt to kill himself; his command to slay Antipater, his son; his sending to his sister Salome and her husband, Alexas, and plotting to slay the leading Jews in the Hippodrome so as to insure general mourning at the time of his death; how Salome and her husband dismissed those in bonds at Herod's death, so Herod's bloodthirsty design was not carried into effect. All these things are told in full; but no faintest illusion, no word, of any masscre of infants at Bethlehem.

Either the account by Matthew is true and was written by divine inspiration, or it is a most vile, malicious, and uncalled-for falsehood; and we are forced to the conclusion it is a falseheod, from the fact that Matthew, as usual, quotes prophecy to sustain his assertion.

"Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying: In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted, because they are not (Matt. ii, 17, 18). This is a quotation from Jer. xxxi, 15. The next verse reads: Thus saith the Lord, Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears, for thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord: and they shall come again from the land of the enemy. This is a lamentation on the part of the mothers of Israel over the captivity of the children of Israel in Babylon, and a prophecy or promis of their deliverance and restoration to their own land. It is in the same poetical or figurativ language as the rest of the chapter. Ramah, is rendered, in the accepted version, high place. But this can hav no application to the murdered infants at Bethlehem.

We are told those children murdered at Bethlehem were the first martyrs for the cause of Christ, and their mothers wept because they were slain.

How about comforting the mothers with the promis, "They shall come again from the land of the enemy?"

All Christians claim these little innocent babies, murdered for Christ's sake, went instantly at death to the arms of Jesus, direct to heaven. Under two years of age, they could not hav sinned, and even the bluest of blue Presbyterians would not admit they went to hell. Yet one thing is certain, either Matthew records that which was utterly false, or else these innocent murdered children went straight to hell, for it is just as solemnly declared, in the prophecy Matthew refers us to, that the children were in the land of the enemy as that Rachel wept for her children. But the next verse settles the matter beyond all possibility of doubt.

"And there is hope in thine end, saith the Lord, that thy children shall come again to their own border" (Jer. xxxi, 17).

It is self-evident this prophecy had no fulfilment or any reference to Christ, or an alleged destruction of children under two years of age by order of Herod, or anyone else, at Bethlehem or any other place, while it does apply to the return of Israel from their Babylonish captivity.

"But when Herod was dead, behold an angel of the Lord appeareth in a dream to Joseph in Egypt, and instructed him to take the child and his mother back to the land of Israel, but hearing that Archelaus reigned in Judea, he was afraid.

"And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, He shall be called a Nazarene" (Matt. ii, 23).

Joseph is by Matthew represented as now, for the first time, dwelling in Nazareth, and that he had to disobey the commands of the angel, and the warning of God, so as to fulfil the prophecy.

The careless reader might take for granted that Jesus was of Nazareth, and hence a Nazarene. But the internal evidence, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene," sends us to the Old Testament to learn what constitutes a Nazarene.

A Nazarene, according to the prophets, was not a resident of Nazareth, but one who has vowed to abstain from wine, grapes, with every production of the vine, and from every kind of intoxicating drinks; was forbidden to cut the hair of his head, or to approach any dead body, even that of his nearest relativ (see Numbers vi, 1–7).

Matthew refers us to the angel's message to Manoah's wife, foretelling the birth of Samson.

"For lo, thou shalt conceive and bear a son, and no razor shall come on his head, for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb; and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Philistines" (Judges xiii, 5).

This was fulfilled in the birth of Samson. It did not in any sense meet fulfilment in Christ, for he was not a Nazarene, according to the prophet, for he repeatedly drank wine, and hesitated not to approach or touch dead bodies. And none will pretend that he delivered Israel out of the hands of the Philistines.

This concludes the testimony of Matthew in regard to the birth of Jesus.

He commences with a false statement, that his book was "the book of the generation of Jesus Christ," when it is admitted to be not of Christ, but of Joseph; and his genealogy is greatly at variance with that of the Old Testament. He quotes five Old Testament prophecies to sustain or prove the truth of his statements in regard to Jesus, and as evidence that this Jesus was the promised messiah—Isaiah vii, 14; Micah v, 2; Hosea xi, 1; Jeremiah xxxi, 15; Judges xiii, 5—yet in every instance one glance at the context of the prophecy he refers to convicts him of perverting and falsifying, in hope to delude the reader into the opinion that prophecy sustained his marvelous fictions.

On close examination it will be found we are entirely dependent for information in regard to the birth of Christ on the testimony of Matthew alone, for Luke (the only other evangelist that givs any account of the birth of Christ) makes no claim to inspiration, either for his own or any other gospel, but prefaces his narrativ of the life of Christ with the declaration, "Forasmuch as many hav taken in hand to draw up a narrativ concerning those matters which hav been fulfilled among us, which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, it seemed good to me also, having traced the course of all things accurately from the first, to write unto thee, in order, most excellent Theophilus, that thou mightest know the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed" (Luke i, 1–4, Revised Version).

It is a well-established rule of law that hearsay is not evidence; yet hearsay is all Luke offers us. Really after the declaration in the preface to his so-called gospel, it is absurd to claim it inspired; but since it is claimed the "internal evidence" will convince us of its truth, genuinness, and divine inspiration, we will carefully examin it and compare with Matthew.

We hav already shown the very marked discrepancy and contradiction of the genealogy.

Luke precedes his account of the birth of Jesus with an account of the birth of John, and tells us all about how the angel of the Lord appeared to Zachariah, and told him that his aged wife should bear a son, and how Zachariah was stricken dumb because he did not believe it. (It was certainly enough to dumbfound anyone.)

Then in the sixth month Mary comes to Elizabeth, etc. (not nice reading. THE TRUTH SEEKER is in favor of instruction in physiology—is sincerely desirous, that children should be educated in the laws of their being, believing they will thereby be saved much of evil and suffering, mentally and physically, but the lessons should be studied in private, with the help of parents. The publication of obscene stories, or the needless repeating or making indecent allusions, it regards as a great wrong. And guided as it is by the laws of nature, to do naught that will do harm or injury to any fellow-creature or sensitiv thing, it can not defile its columns by quoting Luke i, 34–44).

Matthew declares the angel appeared in a dream to Joseph. Luke tells us the angel came to Mary and told her the Holy Ghost would overshadow her—she should conceive a son of the most high, and the Lord would giv him the throne of his father, David, and he should reign over the house of Jacob forever (see Luke i, 30–33). But Gabriel proved as untruthful as Matthew, or Luke himself, for her son, Jesus, did not sit on the throne of David, nor ever reign over the house of Jacob, or any other house, if Christ himself is to be believed.

"And Jesus saith unto him, The foxes hav holes, and the birds of the air hav nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head" (Matt. viii, 20).

Does anyone doubt the meaning of these words? Do they not declare that Jesus had neither house nor home—no place to lay his head?

But Mark and John both positivly contradict Christ.

"And it came to pass that as Jesus sat at meat in his house, many publicans and sinners sat also together with Jesus and his disciples; for there were many, and they followed him" (Mark ii, 15).

Mark declares Jesus not alone had a house, but a large one, capable of accommodating a very large company.

If Christ had no dwelling-place, as he declares he had not, according to Matthew, what are we to think of the testimony of John?

"Then Jesus turned and saw them following, and saith unto them, What seek ye? They said unto him, Rabbi [which is to say, being interpreted, master], where dwellest thou?

"He saith unto them, Come and see. They came and saw where he dwelt, and abode with him that day; for it was about the tenth hour" (John i, 38, 39).

We can hardly blame the disciples for telling wrong stories, when in doing so they but follow the example of their divine Lord and savior Jesus Christ.

This is "internal evidence" that cannot be explained away. Jesus, angels, disciples, all vie with each other in mendacity and contradiction.

"And it came to pass in those days that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be taxed, and this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria" (Luke ii, 1, 2).

Cyrenius, or Quirinus, was made governor of Syria after the banishment of Archelaus in A.D. 6.

He was sent to make an enrolment of property in Syria and Judea—in the Greek termed "Apographee," a sort of registry or census (Smith's Bib. Dict.).

But Luke declares this was at the time of the birth of Christ.

"And all went to be taxed, everyone into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judea, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem (because he was of the house and lineage of David)" (Luke ii, 3, 4).

Matthew declared Joseph turned aside into Nazareth, because afraid of Archelaus, the son of Herod, and dwelt there, that the prophecy might be fulfilled that he should be called a Nazarene. Which is true? Which the falsehood?

"To be taxed with Mary, his espoused wife, being great with child. And so it was that while they were there the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. And she brought forth her first-born son, and wrapped him in swaddling-clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn" (Luke ii, 5–7).

Matthew says nothing of any manger, but declares the wise men came into the house the star stood over.

"And when they were come into the house they saw the young child with Mary his mother" (Matt. ii, 11).

Which is true? Both cannot be. Oh! that that dilatory Holy Ghost would come and guide us into all truth. Certain if he led us to truth, he would lead us far away from the New Testament with its infernal evidence—we should say "internal evidence"—of absurdities, marvelous inconsistencies, and flat contradictions.

Luke tells how the angels were deeply interested in the matter; that while an angel told them of the birth of Jesus, and that he was lying in a manger (thus proving Matthew was inspired by a lying spirit when he declared that the child was lying in the house).

"And this shall be a sign unto you. Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling-clothes, lying in a manger.

"And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men" (Luke ii, 12–14).

Yet Matthew, Mark, nor John ever knew anything of this wonderful angelic chorus.

"And it came to pass as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known to us" (Luke ii, 15).

Is it not a little strange?—Matthew givs account of wise men coming to Jesus, led by a star, but they could not tell where the child was till they inquired of Herod; then the star led them and "stood over the house." Luke knows nothing of this, but tells of shepherds who came directed by angels; they found him in a manger.

Is it not self-evident this idea was by both stolen from the Hindoos? According to Hindoo legends existing 2,000 years before Christ, the birth of Christna was foretold by angels. The mother of Christna, named Maya, was a virgin overshadowed by the most high. While mother and babe lay in a sheep-cote, shepherds came to worship the child. The tyrant of Madura, being impressed that Christna was to supplant him, decreed that all the male children within his state should be put to death. Christna escapes, quits his mother, commences his mission, performs miracles, raising the dead, healing the sick, restoring the deaf and blind, declaring himself the second person in the trinity, and that he was God come upon earth to redeem men from original transgressions.

"And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them.

"And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel before he was conceived in the womb" (Luke ii, 20, 21).

Matthew declared in accordance with prophecy the child should be called "Immanuel," but he never was. We find this name applied to Christ in modern hymn books, but never in the New Testament.

"And when the days of her purification according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord" (Luke ii, 22).

What need of purification after an immaculate conception? If the child she conceived was of the Holy Ghost, if she gave birth to a God, if although a mother she was still a pure and holy virgin, what deed of sin-offerings and atonement, unless, indeed, it was the birth of Jesus fulfilled the Old Testament prophecy;* in the language of Matthew, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, "Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me" (Ps. li, 5).

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a woman hav conceived seed, and born a man-child, then she shall be unclean seven days; according to the days of the separation for her infirmity shall she be unclean.

"And in the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised.

"And she shall then continue in the blood of her purifying three and thirty days: she shall touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purifying shall be fulfilled" (Lev. xii, 1–4).

For forty-one days Luke declares Mary and the child remained at Bethlehem.

Matthew declares all the children at Bethlehem and all the coasts thereof were slain by the soldiers of Herod; that, warned by an angel, Joseph, Mary, and Jesus fled to Egypt, and remained there a year.

Which is truth?

Both Matthew and Luke are declared to be holy men who wrote inspired of God. Could a God of truth inspire such positiv contradictions. Who, which, are we to believe? It is impossible to believe, miraculous creatures as were the "holy family," that they were in two places—many miles apart—at the same moment.

Luke tells of the sacrifice of Mary and the atonement made for her by Priest Simeon (although since God overshadowed her she could not in the matter hav sinned); of the thankfulness of the aged prophetess Anna, etc.

"And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth.

"And the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him.

"Now, his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover" (Luke ii, 39–41).

Here we hav the assertion of Luke that Joseph, Mary, and Christ returned direct to Nazareth, their own city, immediately after the rites of Mary's purification.

Matthew declares Joseph went direct from Egypt into Nazareth, because afraid of Archelaus, and thus fulfilled the prophecy: "He shall be called a Nazarene."

We hav now called attention to all the testimony in the four gospels concerning the birth of Christ.

"If the New Testament is defectiv, the church itself is in error, and must be given up as a deception" (Dr. Tischendorf).

Dear Christian friends, in all candor and reverence for truth and honesty, is it such a record as any sane, intelligent person can believe?

If we are to never mind the contradictions and mysteries, but accept what we can understand and believe, and let all the rest go, then certainly the New Testament account of the birth of Christ must go.

We will next examin the "internal evidence" of truth and divine inspiration of the life, teachings, example, and miracles of Christ. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Rochester, N. Y.

* Worship of Mary.—What was the origin of the worship of Mary? Certainly not the Bible. There is not a word there from which it could be inferred, nor in the creeds, nor in the fathers of the first five centuries. Yet to the whole Roman Catholic world, how very sacred is this belief. Does long continuance, and the church, and good people's reverence prove a thing true, right, and holy? No. Then, if it does not prove the virgin should be adored, how does it prove the son should be worshiped?

It was not until the time of Nestorius, the celebrated theologian, born in Northern Syria, near the opening of the fifth century, who in 428 A.D. became patriarchate of Constantinople, that the church applied to Mary the term, "Theotokos."

Down to the time of the Nestorian controversy the cultus of the Blessed Virgin would appear to hav been wholly external to the church, and to hav been regarded as heretical. Nestorius maintained that the child born of Mary was not divine, but merely an ordinary human being, until the divinity subsequently united itself to him.

This was condemned by the council of Ephesus, 431 A.D., and the title "Theotokos," loosely translated "Mother of God," was sanctioned.

"The object of the council, and of the Anti-Nestorians, was in no sense to add honor to the mother, but to maintain the true doctrin with respect to the son. From this time the worship of Mary grew apace" (Smith's Bib. Dict.).

Cretinism Again.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just read with interest your reply to the inquiry of M. Bone; but one of the main causes of cretinism is overlooked. People living on the northern slopes of mountains, and especially in mountain gorges, where the sunlight never penetrates, after a few generations, become scrofulous. The scrofula, in turn, givs rise to goiter, and, one by one, are added all those revolting symptoms which you so well describe.

Old Dr. Bowditch, of Boston, used to write a good deal on the importance of sunlight, and Theodore Parker, in taking up what Bowditch said on the subject, made some observations of his own. He found that on the northern slopes of the New England hills and mountains, scrofula was induced, and, finally, consumption. But really the most revolting illustrations of the injurious results arising from the absence of sunlight are found in the mountains of Switzerland. I hav seen them myself, and can well say that I do not wish to look on them again. If people would be particular in seeking sunny localities for residences, and then would locate their living and sleeping rooms on the southerly sides of their houses, they would do much to improve the health of the family. It was related, not long ago, in the press, that a dentist, who had his laboratory and workroom in the northerly portion of his residence, was so continually threatened with consumption that he had to spend his winters in Florida. He was induced to project a wing on the side of his house, giving him a southerly and westerly exposure of his workroom, and his health immediately improved, rendering his trips to the South quite unnecessary. I myself once treated a very bad case of scrofulous catarrh, which seemed irremediable in its persistency, and seriously threatened the patient with consumption. Her room was located in the northern portion of the house in which she resided. I induced her to move out of her comfortable quarters into a trunk-room in the attic, which had a southern facing, and I had no further difficulty with the case. These observations may hav some value to your readers, and if anyone is benefited by them I shall be repaid for my trouble in preparing them, and you will doubtless feel repaid for your space in giving them publicity.

Yours truly, E. B. FOOTE, SR., M.D.

Here is a pun on the word cretin which we find in the London Freethinker: "Capt. Dyas sends us a funny little story related of the syndic or mayor of a town in Val d'Aosta. Val d'Aosta, though in Italy (Piedmont), is inhabited by a mixed race, speaking a barbarous dialect. At the late census the syndic was ordered to send in a return of all the idiots (cretins) living in his commune; but the worthy magistrate must hav been but a poor linguist, since he confounded the word cretin with Chretien, and was not a little indignant that it should be supposed there were any heretics residing within its limits—Val d'Aosta being one of the most orthodox parts of Italy. He therefore wrote in his census return: 'Nous sommes tous cretins ici' [We are all idiots here.] 'In my humble opinion,' says the captain, 'he was quite right; for though I am aware that one can be a cretin and not a Christian, I cannot understand for the life of me how anyone can sincerely believe the dogmas of Christianity and not be a cretin.'"

Cremation.

To-day a feeling generally prevails that the cemeteries are centers of infection for the diffusion of epidemic maladies, and that their neighborhood is a menace by reason of their emanations and their influence upon percolating waters. This hurtful influence has long been recognized. In India the nativs yet expose their dead upon the banks of the Ganges or at the summit of the Towers of Silence. They become a prey in both instances to rapacious animals, and become partially harmless through their destruction.

The Jews, Etruscans, Ethiopians, Greeks, and Romans had recourse to embalmment or incineration. Cremation fully satisfies the requirements of modern sanitation. The embalmment as practiced to-day demands cares and expenses which are never applied, and it has been shown that the chemical bodies employed are insufficient to destroy all the sorts of germs, spores, bacteria, etc., which arise. It only momentarily protects the body.

The process of embalmment among the Egyptians was long and complicated. It was based upon the use of reagents, and upon drying in the air or in furnaces. Cremation as at present executed is completely satisfactory, every atom of noxious gas even being consumed.—Scientific American.

Two Opinions of the Creation Story.

From a lecture by Prof. Dana at Yale College, as reported by the New Haven Evening Register.

Prof. Dana discussed the book of Genesis and geology yesterday afternoon in President Porter's lecture room, and had many hearers. The professor said the earth had been gradually made, and in all the different periods of the world's growth there has been a gradual progress in the forms of life.

In the Archæan age there was probably no life; this was followed by an age in which there were the lowest forms of it, as sponges and worms. Then came in regular order fishes, reptils, small quadrupeds, birds, large quadrupeds, and, last of all, man. As to these facts there are no geological doubts. When the fiat went forth the result was not immediately accomplished. The days were longer than twenty-four hours. The periods of the earth's rotation had not been discovered. There are two great periods, the inorganic and the organic, the account of each of which is begun with the creation of light. Science shows that light is molecular motion, and if this molecular energy ever began it was then.

The first creation was the universe, the next the separating of the different parts of the system. Then the land rose above the water, and on it a primitiv vegetation grew, which received its light from the earth's aurora. Then comes the second, the organic era—the creation of the sun, moon, and stars was simply breaking away the clouds which encircled the earth. In the inorganic era the principle of life in the lowest kind of plants was begun, and in the organic era this life gradually advances till man is created. The account of Genesis and geology accord in a wonderful way.

Moses probably did not fully understand what he wrote, and we cannot but believe that he must hav been inspired when he wrote that which the greatest advance in science has just enabled man to understand.

From Prof. Thomas Huxley's American Addresses.

In the first place, it is not my business to say what the Hebrew text contains, and what it does not; and in the second place, were I to say that this was the biblical hypothesis (creation in six literal days), I should be met by the authority of many eminent scholars, to say nothing of men of science, who in recent times hav absolutely denied that this doctrin is to be found in Genesis at all. If we are to listen to them, we must believe that what seems so clearly defined as days of creation—as if very great pains had been taken that there should be no mistake—that these are not days at all, but periods that we may make just as long as convenience requires. We are also to understand that it is consistent with that phraseology to believe that plants and animals may hav been evolved by natural processes, lasting millions of years, out of similar rudiments. A person who is not a Hebrew scholar can only stand by and admire the marvelous flexibility of a language which admits of such diverse interpretations. Assuredly, in the face of such contradictory authority upon matters upon which one is competent to form no judgment, he will abstain from any opinion, as I do; and in the third place, I hav carefully abstained from speaking of this as a Mosaic doctrin, because we are now assured upon the authority of the highest critics, and even of dignitaries in the church, that there is no evidence whatever that Moses ever wrote this chapter, or knew anything about it.

From Prof. Thomas Huxley's lecture at Nashville, on the Testimony of the Rocks.

I need not say that this view of the past history of the globe is a very different one from that which is commonly taken. It is so widely different that it is absolutely impossible to effect any kind of community, any kind of parallel, far less any sort of reconciliation between the two.

"Ichabod, March 5, 1883."

THE DAY G. W. FOOTE WAS SENTENCED TO TWELVE MONTHS IMPRISONMENT FOR BLASPHEMY.

"Write that above your doors, O fools and blind!
The days are past when matter governed mind.
Priests of a doting god and slaves of slaves,
Whose shackled hands dig one another's graves!
Twelve months in prison!
Lo! the sentence falls,
While hiss and scoffing fill the judgment halls.
Where are the hands which once for this foul creed,
'Mid flame and torture, made an Atheist bleed?
Dead—like the powers your fathers used so well
To send souls heavenward through the flames of hell.
And you, poor palsied demons—you ere long,
With them thrice damned shall swell Gehenna's throng.
Your god is dead; your heaven a hope bewrayed;
Your hell a by-word, and your creed a trade.
Your vengeance—what?
A mere polluting touch—
A cripple striking with a broken crutch!"

Religious Ceremonies at the Funerals of Freethinkers.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I fully indorse the views of Philip G. Peabody, Esq., as expressed in your issue of Nov. 17, 1883, relativ to the impropriety of Christian "antics" over the body of a dead Infidel.

It is contemptible and disgraceful, and those who carry out such a farce over his defenseless remains (knowing full well that, if he were alive, he would protest with all his being against such an outrage), are not his friends, but traitors to the love they professed to bear for him while living.

The monument now stands in Greenwood Cemetery. Mr. Sheehan has done his part of the work well. Although the pile is an inexpensiv one compared to the costly shafts around the lot, there is no more striking monument in the cemetery. It is in keeping with the character of the man whose resting-place it marks—plain, massiv, rugged. It looks honest, lasting. To complete it requires only the placing of the medallion and the cutting of the inscriptions, which work is progressing as fast as the cold weather will permit. The builder and letterer, Mr. John Sheehan, of New Rochelle, and the sculptor, Mr. Wilson Macdonald, hav put cost figures on their work. It could not be duplicated for the money. Mr. Sheehan's bill so far is $1,000, which has been paid. The sculptor will hav to hav $150—about $100 less than the usual price for such a large medallion. The lettering selected by the committee will cost within a few cents of $250. This makes the account stand:

Amount paid for plain monument,	$1,000 00
" to be paid for medallion,	150 00
" " " lettering,	250 00
	$1,400 00
Amount of subscriptions received to date,	1,255 21
Amount needed to complete the work,	$144 79

It is earnestly hoped that this will be made up before the close of the year, that the artists may be promptly paid. It is a matter of pride that all the work has been done by Liberals and personal friends of Mr. Bennett, consequently is well done. We believe it unnecessary to make further appeal to Mr. Bennett's friends, than to simply state the the amount of the deficiency, to hav it speedily made up.

A Victory for Freethought.

What the Montreal Daily Star terms a "painful backdown" has occurred on the part of the Canadian customs authorities. The censorship over the importation of Freethought books has been discontinued, for the present at least.

Immediately after the dismissal of the suit of Mr. Lawrence against the Montreal collector on a legal technicality, Mr. Charles Stevens, secretary of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club, ordered of us, to further test the matter, copies of the "Age of Reason," which were duly sent by express. They passed the argus-eyed collector. On his attention being called to the matter, he said the books were overlooked, and further added that he knew how to act in case more were brought into the country. More were at once ordered by Mr. Stevens, and this time they were sent by mail. The attention of the collector was specially called to the package by Mr. Stevens, but he declined to seize the books.

This backdown may be very painful to the Christian part of the Montreal community, but it is a joyous victory to the Freethinker. Mr. Stevens deserves great credit and hearty thanks for his persistency in forcing the authorities to meet the issue.

Letters from Christians.

In sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to addresses sent in by friends, an occasional argumentativ Christian is found. Here are two letters. The first has an air of sadness pervading it. The writer we can easily imagin is a "dear Christian brother," meek-eyed and sanctimonious, who is inexpressibly shocked that any one should be found bold and (in his opinion) bad enough to question "our dear holy religion." He goes to church three times on Sunday, attends the Wednesday and Friday evening prayer-meetings, sends his children to Sunday-school, and regards an Infidel as the being, next to Rome, that the beast of the apocalyps typifies. He would cry a little at seeing a denier of "our blessed savior" burnt, but would on the whole regard it as a praiseworthy act, as the one who would reject the Lord Jesus must be a bad man, and unworthy to pollute the atmosphere breathed by the true Christian. He writes:

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS., Nov. 17, 1883.

E. M. MACDONALD ESQ., Dear Sir: Thanks for the specimen copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It has given me more light as to the spirit of Infidelity than anything else I hav ever read. How far from satisfying it must be to edit a paper whose prominent feature and work is to show up the faults of others. You should hav the sympathy and prayers of every Christian heart. God be praised that so many can say, "I know that my redeemer liveth." May the dear Lord bless you in seeking the truth, and may you eventually experience the joy of that "blessed hope," and of that conscious fellowship with Christ, which is unspeakably blessed.

Yours very truly, C. D. MONROE.

Did it never occur to our prayerful friend that if the Christian religion was the one perfect thing in existence, God-given and God-protected, that its friends claim it is, no one could be found to find fault with it? But can Mr. Monroe blame us for criticising a religion that has in itself no inherent proof that it is divine—a religion that condemns to eternal flames the vast majority of the human race—a religion whose murdered victims number millions—a religion that has been propagated by the sword of power—a religion which incarcerated our own dearest friend in a dungeon—a religion which has its victims even now in English jails—a religion false in its premises, dishonoring in its motivs, and damnable in its principles? Yet Christianity has done, and is, all of these. It has hindered civilization by discouraging inventions, by promoting wars, by contending that the sum and substance of all knowledge fit for the human race to hav is contained in an old book which upon examination proves to be an unscientific, bloody, cruel, and barbarous account of something that never occurred. A man who would not be found fighting against such a religion as that, when he realized the gross imposition, must be a pretty poor stick. Mr. Monroe is perfectly free to pray for us. We can stand it if he can.

The other communication is from a different type of Christians. They are two of a kind—a small pair. They seek reward for their beliefs. Had we a chromo to offer perhaps they would accept our "creed!" If we could promis them a hell for their enemies and a heaven for themselvs and their friends, they might subscribe, or at least borrow the paper occasionally. The two Heads unite in saying:

RICHMOND, ARK., Nov. 23, 1883.

We received your paper of 17th. We hav no use for your Infidel journal; if you are right, we would not be benefited by being convinced of the truth of your doctrin. And as you hav no reward to offer for our acceptance of your creed, we respectfully decline to change our opinions or take your paper. J. C. and H. C. HEAD.

The Messrs. Head can only turn from one creed to another. If they saw a wolf gnawing the vitals of a child, before destroying the beast, they would seek some other animal, a little less ferocious perhaps, to replace it. They would substitute a fever for the smallpox, for some sort of disease they evidently regard as necessary to mankind. The idea that good health is the most desirable condition appears to never hav entered their minds.

We were not aware that THE TRUTH SEEKER had a creed for the Messrs. Head to reject. In common with all the Freethinkers in the country we hav a few demands which we shall continually press upon the attention of the country, and which we submit to the Messrs. Head. For the sake of the argument they may be called a "creed." The demands are:

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall not be exempt from just taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy, and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and in all institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that the public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the president of the United States, or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts, shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts, and in all other departments of the government, shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States, and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

These our Arkansas friends reject in advance. They demand that the churches shall be exempt from taxation. In other words, they are willing to extract money from other people's pockets to pay their own debts. Such a proceeding is eminently Christian, but is it honest, Messrs. Head? You demand, also, by your rejection of our "creed," that we shall be taxed to pay your preacher in Congress; that we shall be forced to not only support your orphans, but convert them to a creed we hold in detestation. Is this a fair procedure? or should we in addition be compelled to throw in a reward?

By the rejection of the fourth and fifth articles of our "creed," the brothers Head are avowing themselvs in favor of a practical union of church and state. Did they ever read history? Do they know the bloody results of such a policy? Do they know that the Inquisition, the Bartholomew massacre, the sacrifice of Geneva, the hanging of witches, the whipping and murder of Quakers, were all done under a union of church and state? Do they know that no country has ever possessed true freedom wherein the priest sat at the right hand of the king? This country was settled by religious exiles who in turn exiled other religious people. Do the brothers Head want the religion that drove the Quakers into the wilderness, that put upon the statute books of the District of Columbia a law punishing the heretic with death, to be enthroned in our Constitution? It is hard to think it, yet it must be so.

And what does the rejection of the sixth article of our creed imply? Suppose one of the Messrs. Head should become an Atheist. Such a thing is not impossible. Suppose some good Christian (and we are hanging lots of such every day) should murder this Mr. Head's wife, and Mr. Head were the only witness who could swear to the identity of the murderer; the good Christian would object of course to Mr. Head's testimony, on the ground of his Atheism, and Mrs. Head's murder would go unavenged. This is not an extreme case. It is only a short time ago that an Atheist's testimony was rejected in this state, and the laws hav not since been changed. Such an occurrence might take place in most of the states of the union, as the laws are similar. Do the Head brothers wish to reject a "creed" that would make such injustice impossible? We hardly think they do. Read this article of the "creed" again, Messrs. Head, and see if you will peremptorily reject it.

The eighth demand in our "creed" is that Christian morality shall be replaced by natural morality. Just what Christian morality is we hav shown. One phase of it is making Freethinkers pay taxes on church property; it is lobbying money from the state treasuries to convert orphans, and from the national treasury to maintain chaplains; it is debarring Infidels from the exercise of their natural rights. This eighth demand is an enlargement of the seventh, which objects to good Christians, like the brothers Head, telling everybody else how they shall pass their Sundays. Christian morality is not natural morality, and not true morality, and for anyone to reject the articles of the "creed" we hav pointed out is self-immolation on the altar of dishonesty.

Are the Arkansas brothers ready for the sacrifice? The ninth demand includes the others, and is so manifestly fair that we cannot conceive that our Southern friends had studied it carefully in all its bearings when they declined to accept it. This part of our "creed" will bear ancther repetition:

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Is there any good reason why every American citizen who truly loves his country should not make that demand? It puts all religions on a perfect equality before the law. It givs the Confucianism of the Chinese no advantage over the Christianity of the Arkansas people. It places the heretic-burning Catholic and the witch-hanging and Quaker-whipping Congregationalists exactly on a level, giving either no advantage, and saying to both that they must pursue their avocations of soul-saving and body-destroying without the aid of the United States government. It makes our country what our Revolutionary forefathers intended it to be—an asylum for people of all religions and no religion—one spot on the earth where a man can pray and go to the church that best suits him, or omit prayers and church-going without being called to account by self-constituted censors backed by the state power. This ninth demand of our "creed" accomplishes in a statesmanlike manner, and without bloodshed, what Italy waded through seas of blood to obtain—the separation of church and state. Italy gave to the church till she had all the wealth, and the state had finally to confiscate it. The unification of priestcraft and statecraft in the last century produced a revolution in France that is still the horror of the world. Mexico had almost exactly the same experience as Italy. The ninth demand will prevent for the United States a repetition of these disastrous blunders. It will do more—it will, for almost the first time, define and hold the government to its province, the honest administration of secular affairs, in which religion has no part, parcel, or thought. Every man his own pope, and no one pope greater than another.

We believe when the Arkansas brothers come to think this matter over carefully, they will accept at least the ninth article in our "creed." Anyway, we are glad they wrote us, and the praying brother also has our thanks.

Stand up for Principles.

In John Swinton's Paper of last Sunday Mr. D. G. Croly makes this true statement.

"The discussion of the fundamental principles of our government would help to raise the tone of our political debate, and furnish parties with worthy issues for public consideration."

It has been a source of amazement to us for a long time that the political papers could say so much and say so little. The only political parties in the field to-day with any distinctiv principles are the Greenback and Anti-Monopolist. The two great (in numbers only) parties are contending for spoils. The Democratic cry is "Turn the rascals out!" and the Republican reply is that it is better to keep the gorged rascals in than to let the hungry ones hav a chance at the public crib. Even the tariff issue is avoided by both Democrats and Republicans, so afraid are they of losing votes.

We suggest that one of the parties attach the Nine Demands of Liberalism to its platform. That would afford issues new to most of the people of the United States, and embody principles sufficiently fundamental to create parties with vitality beyond that afforded by the nourishment of the spoils of office.

Holiday Presents.

In making selections of holiday gifts for their friends we hope the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will bear in mind that books are very appropriate presents, and especially Liberal books, which serve at one and the same time as an educator and a reminder of personal friendship. We hav many volumes on our list that will make splendid holiday offerings. The four volumes of Mr. Bennett's travels around the world make an especially valuable gift. Beauty is added to worth in the morocco or leather covered editions, although the plain red cloth is a very attractiv binding. Paine's works is another standard book for the holidays. And a look at our list will reveal dozens of equally suitable presents. Frederica Macdonald's "Nathaniel Vaughan" is a splendidly written labor reform novel. Putnam's "Golden Throne" needs but to be mentioned to be appreciated at once. Either of Wm. McDonnell's novels would be a welcome present. Please bear in mind also that we can supply any book as cheap as any publisher, and shall be thankful for orders. The small profit made helps pay the many bills weekly presented.

Another good way to make some poorer Liberal friend happy would be to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to him for a year. Fifty-two times would he be reminded of your kindness. We doubt if a gift more satisfactory to the giver and the recipient could be found than this.

Friends, in distributing your favors, remember THE TRUTH SEEKER. Then will the new year find you conscious of having done your duty in supporting the cause in which we are all working.

Does Anyone Know About This?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A gentleman handed me the inclosed slip referring to the recantation of a certain Mr. Hegard, the Professor of Philosophy in the University of Copenhagen, who was an "apostle of Atheism," but now has found peace in God. As this paragraph is going the rounds of the papers, can you tell us who this "apostle of Atheism" is? Perhaps some of your German readers may know him. Yours truly, A. A. BELL.

This is the extract:

"H. Hegard, Professor of Philosophy in the University of Copenhagen, as we learn from a foreign paper, has until recently been the apostle of Atheism in his country. He has, says the Semeur Vaudois, just published a second edition of one of his works, and this is what he says in the introduction: 'The experiences of life, its sufferings and griefs, hav shaken my soul, and hav broken the foundation upon which I formerly thought I could bnild. Full of faith in the sufficiency of science, I thought to hav found in it a sure refuge from all the contingencies of life. This illusion is vanished; when the tempest came which plunged me in sorrow, the moorings, the cable of science, broke like thread. Then I seized upon that help which many before me hav laid hold of. I sought and found peace in God. Since then I hav certainly not abandoned science, but I hav assigned to it another place in my life.'"

The Salamanca Convention.

THE SPEAKERS AND RAILROAD AND BOARDING HOUSE ACCOMODATIONS.

The speakers who hav agreed to be present and address the Salamanca Freethought Convention, that commences Thursday evening, December 27th, and holds through the next three days, are: T. B. Wakeman; ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan; John E. Remsburg, of Kansas; Dr. T. L. Brown, of Binghamton; George W. Taylor, of North Collins, N. Y.; Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa.; ex-Rev. Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, and Judge McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.

There are prospects of Lyman C. Howe, George Chainey, and Charles Watts, also being present.

The following arrangement with the railroad companies has been made: The Rochester and Pittsburg railroad company has agreed to sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from all stations on that line to persons attending the Salamanca Freethinkers' Convention. The N. Y., L. E. & W. R. R. will return home at one cent a mile, all who attend the convention over that road, and the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia road will do the same, and the N. Y. P. & O. R. R., will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from all the principal stations on that road to the Freethinkers.

The headquarters of the convention will be at the Dudley House, where the fare will be $1.50 per day for single rooms, and $1.25 per day where two persons occupy one bed. The other hotels, and all the boarding houses, will entertain the Freethinkers for $1.00 per day.

Dr. T. L. Brown has agreed to preside at the convention.

H. H. Hall, who so delighted the Freethinkers at the Rochester Convention with his singing, has been engaged for this convention. And a fine quartet of Salamanca singers will also contribute their services.

The season tickets for the whole convention will be fifty cents, and an admission fee of ten cents will be charged at each session, after the first, to transient attendants. Thursday evening the convention will be opened by an address from ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham. And we earnestly request each person who intends to attend, to notify us immediately by postal card so that we may send them a ticket that will entitle them to cheap railroad fare.

The following is going the rounds of the Secular papers of western New York: "Ex-Rev. Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, who is to be one of the speakers at the Salamanca Freethinkers' Convention, two years since was an orthodox clergyman, holding revival meetings in various sections of the country." James P. Allen, of Conewango Valley, writes to Mr. Green: "I and Mrs. Allen will be at the convention, and there will be from here a number of persons who were converted under Mr. Reynolds's preaching who desire to hear him as a Freethinker."

The N. Y. P. & O. R. R. will sell excursion tickets to the Salamanca Convention from the following stations: Cleveland, Akron, Kent, Ravenna, Warren, Greenville, Meadville, Carey, Jamestown, Randolph, Franklin, and Oil City. H. L. GREEN.

Liberal Congress.

Arrangements hav been completed for the holding of a Grand convention of Freethinkers at the New Opera House in Liberal, Barton Co., Mo., commencing Friday, Dec. 21, 1883, and continuing four days. CAPT. FRANK GREENE, Cor. Sec., Liberal, Mo.

The Boston Liberal Club.

Mr. David Kirkwood essayed to defend the despotism of majorities, but failed to repair the breaches made in the wall of demagogism by the onslaught of the individualists. He thought it self-evident that we must hav some kind of government, and so far as he could see, government by majorities was the best yet devised. He considered that the practice of majority rule in America had given better social results than hereditary rule in the older countries; and the fact that the people of the old world came to this country by millions demonstrated the superiority of democracy, and that its application in America was not a failure.

In following the opener, Mr. Elllis B. McKenzie said that the problem of all history had been to discover how social order could be conserved without despotism. Democracy in America has invoked the despotism of the mob. New York city, with its Tammany chief, and its incipient billionaires, is a sample product of "our institutions." The gigantic oil monopoly, which shadows not only the United States, but the whole civilized world, is another sample. Hereditary government is a chronic form of despotism; democracy, or majority rule, is the acute form of despotism, and precedes either a cure or a relapse. We are now in the gap of the passage from the acute despotism of demagogs and majorities, which is becoming intolerable to the glorious liberty of the sons of freedom, as it shall be revealed in the economic republic.

Prof. Wetherell was unable to see why the despotism of the individual was more defensible than that of majorities; and some of his hearers were equally unable to see what relation that had to the question under discussion.

Mr. Lysander Spooner is one of the few men who are unable to talk unless they say something. He went straight to the heart of the matter, and declared that the rights of man, and the principles of justice, are forever superior to the fiat of one or a majority.

Mr. Horace Seaver argued that because the lecturer came from the old country, he must know how it was himself. As he informs us that he likes this country best, that is proof that our institutions are a success. He made the astonishing statement that the individualists claim that a man has a right to do as he pleases, without regard to the equal rights of other men.

In closing, the essayist failed to answer any of the points that were made by the second speaker. He assumed the right of the majority to rule, and did not see why "soreheaded individualists" should object to coming up to the captain's office and paying their taxes like men. No matter whether the street in front of his house was cleaned or not; no matter if the private dispatch companies would carry a letter for one-half what the government charged; no matter if the public school was a public nuisance, the man who wants his child to get an education that has some relation to the life that child is to liv, must pay his share of the taxes, all the same, to help educate his neighbor's children; for has not that modern divinity, the voice of God in the voice of a majority, so decreed? Where, then, is the piping individualist who has the temerity to suggest that the individual has some rights which majorities are bound to respect? Livs there, in this land shadowed by the wings of our spread eagle, such an ungrateful wretch?

Last Sunday morning Mr. B. Q. Butts delivered an essay entitled "The Bread of Life; or, Mind the only Life Principle," in which he endeavored to set forth the principles of the new method of curing diseases, by the influence of the physician's mind over the patient's matter, without the necessity of personal contact.

Notes from the Pacific Lecture Field.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Please find within $15 for six yearly subscriptions for The Truth Seeker, to be sent as directed in my private letter.

This writing finds me once more at home under my own vine and fig-tree, at San Jose—the brightest and best of all places to me—with feelings akin to those of the storm-tossed traveler as he reaches a harbor of safety and rest.

Since leaving home on the first of March last I hav canvassed a good portion of Oregon, Washington territory, British Columbia, and Idaho, and during the term of eight months hav lectured on an average four nights in each week—a thing I hope not to be called to do again.

The trip on the whole has been marked with abundant success from every point of view, and although this was my seventh course of lectures at several points during the past ten years, I found no abatement in audience or interest, but rather an increase of both.

Freethought in the great northwest is rapidly on the increase, and common sense—the rational, natural sense of the people—is asserting itself everywhere as against the religious or superstitious sense so long dominant in the world.

It is true that everywhere when I am announced to speak, the lovers of Jesus ring the bells and blow the gospel trumpets, call union meetings, and rattle the chains of superstition. Not only so, the master or sky-pilot in charge of every flock, as soon as he hears of the approaching wolf, sends out a few holy sisters to warn the prudent and bulldoze the weaker ones, and circulate pious lies about the horrid Infidel advertised to lecture.

But as all signs of rain fail in dry weather, so do all attempts to keep the people from hearing our side of the question utterly fail; and on the whole I think these Christian lies do us good, and ultimately go home to roost upon the heads and hearts of those that retail them.

Since my last letter, sent from Baker City, Oregon, I responded to the call of James Wardwell to deliver a course of lectures at Emmettville, Idaho, about twenty-five miles from Boise City, and I was all the more anxious to make the acquaintance of these people from this fact. I chanced to occupy a seat in the stage, each on our way over the Blue Mountains from Pendleton to Legrand, in company with a verdant, "strawberry blonde" Methodist preacher and a holy sister returning from the Methodist conference just closed at Walla Walla. They seemed to be very holy, especially the sister, a lady well known by the people of Boise and vicinity. Their burden of conversation was love to Jesus and contempt for Infidels, and that their preachers at the conference had utterly wiped Ingersoll out, and what a bad man he was, and what a horrid thing Infidelity was, and how it had produced the vice, crime, and misery of the world; and finally, as a case in point, this holy lady cited the Emmettville people to prove that Infidels are bad people; and that only four Christians lived in that community, and that one of them was her own sister.

This revelation rather startled me as something new, as my observation and understanding in regard to the moral status of Infidels and the true sources of vice and crime in this country and Europe had led me to the opposit belief. And to make the conversation more interesting for these red-hot psalm-singers, I chipped in and read them a short but pungent chapter of facts relating to the moral status of Infidels, and the source of criminality, petty thieves and capital criminals, as revealed by the records of crime in our country and the world, as not traceable to unbelief, but almost invariably to believers in Christ and the atonement.

I also expressed a sincere doubt as to the truthfulness of the scarlet woman's statements about the Emmettville people, and hoped to make a more favorable report after my visit to them.

Of course they loved Jesus so much that they both got as mad as wet hens about the facts which I presented, and drew a long breath of relief when I left the coach.

It is a remarkable fact that in almost every case where Christians attack the moral characters of Infidels, through want of sound logic to refute the facts opposed to them, they prove to be whitewashed people of doubtful characters—which, from the most reliable information, was the character of this gospel sharp and holy sister.

In due time we reached the wicked people of Emmettville, a small town on the Pyatte river. My first three lectures were given in the school-house, the usual place for meetings; but, proving much too small for the audience, a larger place was provided for the balance of the course, and in truth I must say that although the community is thoroughly Infidel, there are no better people on top of the earth.

My audience here numbered about two hundred and fifty people; orderly, thoughtful, and well-read—too well-read to be Christians, and too Infidel to be criminals.

My hearty thanks are due here to James Wardwell, who kindly cared for me, managed my course of lectures, and helped to open the way for me at other points in the vicinity; also to J. A. Bennett, L. D. Gill, D. Knox, O. Turley and wife, and Mrs. Mary Berge, a woman with plenty of brains and a good heart, and I shall long remember the kind friends at Emmettville.

From this point another Infidel took me in his carriage to Quartzburg, stopping over night at his own home, on my way to the above point. His name is A. G. Church; his home, nestled in among the beautiful gold-bearing hills of Idaho, is a place of rest, presided over within by Mrs. J. Benoit, once a Catholic, but now a free woman, and an angel of kindness in her household. Brother Church made me both glad and sorry; glad to hav met such a warm friend of our departed chief, D. M. Bennett, and the cause of truth, and sorry when we parted.

On the following day I reached Quartzburg, in the great Boise Basin, still rich in mineral wealth, but, like all mining districts, presenting everywhere an upturned appearance from the busy hunt after the precious metals in the past.

And yet there are many rich mines in the Basin waiting for capital to come and reap a rich harvest, which it is sure to do, now that the Oregon Short-Line Railroad is fast pushing its way through the territory to Puget Sound. And although Idaho presents to the casual observer only a wide stretch of mountains and sage-brush plains, yet I am favorably impressed with the elements and resources of wealth in this wild territory as being second to no other in point of mineral wealth in the Union. And better days are in prospect for these people, who hav so long been deprived of rail connection with the outer world.

The people of Idaho are kind and generous, and everywhere manifested a degree of mental freedom not found in many of the older states, and I only regret that my time was so limited in the territory.

The great Boise Basin is not a flat-bottomed affair, as one might infer from the term basin, but consists of an area of about six by twenty miles of small valleys and rolling hills, surrounded by a rim of lofty mountains, and contains many mines rich in gold and silver, of which I may mention the Banner silver mine, yielding daily one hundred pounds of silver, with so small an outlay as to leave a large margin of profit to the owners. Also the well-known Gold Hill mine, at Quartzburg, is noted for its richness, and is running a twenty-four stamp mill, and has been in operation for thirteen years. One of the proprietors of this mine, W. A. Coughanour, a bright and kindly Methodist man, treated us with great kindness, showing us through the works. And, above all, the gold hill cabinet of minerals and specimens of nature's handiwork struck me as being the finest I had ever seen. And while I feasted my eyes upon them I could not help thinking that in this cabinet are more true divine revelations than I had found in twenty-five years of Methodism.

I met with a new experience here. A snow storm was raging. The hall was without the means to warm it, but through the kindness of Mr. Wallace, his liquor saloon was nicely warmed, lighted, and seated for me to lecture in, which I did to a fair audience, on the "Theology of Nature."

My thanks are due at Quartzburg to two of nature's noblemen—C. E. Clark and A. G. Phillips, whose hearts are in the right place. This I knew as soon as I entered their house and saw Ingersoll's and D. M. Bennett's pictures on the wall, our Liberal papers and Bennett's Round-the-World volumes on the table, and I felt at home. In fact, I found out what kind of stuff Brother Phillips was made of before I reached his home, as we met him some miles from Quartzburg, on his way to Boise on urgent business. Not having been apprised of my coming, just here the true spirit of his manhood and his love for the cause of truth shone out bright and clear, as he turned his horse about and said, "I can't miss these meetings," and he did not miss them; and I must say that I fell in love with him and his family.

My next point was Placerville, where I spoke to a good audience on Individuality. This is a strong Catholic community, and my auditors were at least two-thirds Roman Catholic. Something new again, hence I drew the picture rather mild, and said not a word about the pope, Roman church, or holy virgin Mary; held the entire audience for over two hours, and tried to show them that Individuality is the crowning glory of a well-rounded manhood and womanhood, and that to be proprietor of one's self is better than to be a king, and that marked Individuality is the rich soil from which all true reforms hav sprung.

I cited in point some of the heroes of the world—Jesus, Bruno, Servetus, Luther, Paine, Parker, and others, and what they had done to make man free. And,strange to say that, although the financial part part of the program was generously met by the friends without following the church fashion of passing the hat, a dozen or more of these sons of the Emerald Isle came forward at the close of the lecture and laid down each a silver dollar, saying that the lecture was worth a dollar to them, and promised to do something handsome for me if I would do so more another night. But I bade them good-bye, as I was advertised in advance in other towns.

My next appointment was at Centerville, where I spoke to a very good audience on "Common Sense." Of course such a radical lecture made the cold chills go up the backs of several Christians in the audience, but then I could not help it, for it was my radical night, and I put no brake on the wheels. My thanks are due here to M. F. Waldron, whose name appears in my list of subscribers for The Truth Seeker; also to A. G. Church and D. McDevitt for much kindness. My friend Waldron is a leading merchant, as well as the owner of a gold mine which bids fare to bring him great wealth.

My last appointment in the Basin found me on time for three lectures at Idaho City, once containing several thousands of people, but now only a few hundred. Here we had a fight with the world, the flesh and the devil—not the Idaho World, a bright little paper printed here, as its editor is a Liberal and gave me a splendid report; but two religious cliques, claiming to be the conservators of virtue in the town, tried to keep me from lecturing in the Masonic Hall, but chariots of their God were not strong enough to succeed. Then these dry-rot Christians fell back upon the old method of circulating all sorts of pious lies for Christ's sake, and that my lectures were not fit for a lady to hear—nasty! But here, too, they signally failed, as on the second and third nights a goodly number of ladies put in an appearance, and, sure enough, no one was shocked; all except bigoted saints were pleased.

But such is religious superstition—a mental nightmare, a veritable hereditary snake in the boots—as mean as the devil and as cruel as the grave. It has no heart, conscience, or sense of goodness.

My thanks are due here to William Tincher and others for a helping hand, and with sadness I take leave of my friend Church, who had so kindly brought me from Emmettville, all through the Basin, to this place.

A ride by stage of about forty miles through deep gorges and up the great mountains, sublime in their vastness and beauty, finds me on time at Boise City—a little sore from the pounding I received from riding in a stage loaded down with silver bricks weighing about ninety pounds each, guarded every moment by a Fargo messenger with gun in hand, to save weak men from temptation. Those silver bricks are no doubt a good thing to hav in a poor family, but apparently out of place in the boot of a stage coach.

Boise City, the chief town in Idaho, is a beautiful place of about four thousand inhabitants, and somewhat resembles, in its neat appearance, shaded streets, and homelike homes, with fine fruit orchards at every turn, our bright San Jose.

The people of Boise City, like those of most of our Western towns, are intelligent and stirring people, and generous to a fault. Her school buildings and school system are abreast with the times, as I found on being invited to visit and address the school, which I did with great pleasure. And there is nothing else which so lifts my senses as a secular school of young people all aglow in the race after knowledge. Let the school be free to all, and free from religious taint, and as such it is the proud bulwark of our free institutions, and the day star of our future national glory.

Boise City contains a large Liberal element, which number among them the best, as well as some of the most wealthy and influential, people in the territory. I gave six lectures here to large and nightly increasing audiences. At the close of the course, by request and unanimous vote of the audience, I was invited to deliver two more lectures, which I promised to do on the following week. About this time, as usual, religious fanaticism began to boil like a pot. The preachers and holy sisters ran to and fro, and the Christian element in the Good Templars' Society, whose hall we had been occupying, vcted us out of the hall for the love they bore to Jesus, and our friends secured the pavilion in which to giv the remaining lectures.

The Methodist preacher, a verdant coxcomb, with far more noisy zeal than discretion, preached against Infidelity and Infidels, and broadly hinted that Infidels must be bad people, and that even our chief, Ingersoll, was in favor of nastiness, and had headed a petition asking for the repeal of our law against the transmission of obscene literature through the United States mails. This he made the subject of an article in a newspaper, headed, "Facts to the Law and Testimony," in which this pious dude lied most shamefully on the attitude of Ingersoll in the matter, and also lied most cruelly in the use he made of the facts in the case of D. M. Bennett and Ingersoll. I then challenged this dirt-slinging champion of Christ to a public debate on two propositions, the first involving the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and the second the true sources of civilization; and, the moral life of the world—is it due to the Bible, or is it due to the development of science and knowledge? This the Methodist rooster declined to do, after taking three hours in which to consult the holy sisters of the, ecclesiastical "harem" or church, and, coward-like sneaked into his castle to throw more dirt. This Rev. Banks, a dude among women, reminds me of a pullet spreading herself to set on goose eggs, and by presuming upon the ignorance of the people of Boise City has cut down more hay than he will ever be able to cock up. I then advertised to review the sermon and newspaper article of this slanderer of Infidels and Infidelity for the first night, and on the second night to speak upon the "Demands of Liberalism," which I did to larger audiences than before, in which I endeavored to show the true attitude of D. M. Bennett, Ingersoll, and all other true Infidels.

Many and most sincere thanks are due in Boise City, to P. J. Pefley, for his able management of the course of lectures, and for the kindness of his home and family during my stay in Boise City. Also do I remember gratefully John Lemp, T. C. Galiway, E. J. Curtis, J. B. Broadbent, W. H. Nye, D. Bacon, editor of the Republican, and S. J. Boyakin, editor of the Democrat, both pronounced Liberals, who manfully stood by the truth.

During the interim in my course at Boise City, I spoke two nights by invitation at Middleton in Boise valley, twenty-five miles from Boise City down the valley, where I found a well filled hall anxious to see and hear the Infidel, as many of them came from six to twelve miles to attend the meeting.

My thanks are due here to Chas. Robertson, J. Plowhead, and L. D. Potter, for marked expressions of helpfulness. My work now being ended for the trip, and having spoken twenty-two times in twenty-six days, and having lectured in thirty-five towns, and lectured nearly one hundred and fifty times during a period of eight months on the war path, you can't tell how glad I was to throw down the hatchet and start for home. Taking the train at Boise City, I passed out of Idaho and through northern Utah, one of the most beautiful countries I hav ever seen, reaching Ogden on the second day, and home by the Central Pacific in due time, where I hope to remain during the winter, lecturing only near home until spring, when, if health favors me, I contemplate going east as far as Salt Lake during May; then north, through the Wood river mining district, as far as Boise and Silver City during June and July, then by the Northern Utah to the principal towns in Montana, and from thence across to the Northern Pacific via Spokane, Cheeney, Colfax, Dayton, Walla Walla, Portland, via Puget Sound, home. In the mean time I will be glad to hear a word from any Liberals living on the line of route whose hearts are in the right place; and also glad to receive calls to lecture during the winter at any point not too far distant from my home at San Jose, California. Yours for mental freedom, not for Christ, DR. J. L. YORK.

Letters from Friends.

NEW ALBANY, IND., NOV. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith please find order for $2 50 for renewal of THE TRUTH SEEKER until Jan. 1, 1885. I hav been a regular subscriber from the first number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am now in my seventy-seventh year, and cannot do without it as long as I can read.

With kindest regards for Mrs. Mary Bennett, and wishing you success, I am yours for Freethought and Spiritualism, JOHN BROWN.

SARANAC, MICHIGAN, NOV. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find a draft for $2.50 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year from Oct. 15th, which time it expired. You will excuse my carelessness, as I intended to hav sent it then. Tell Brother Peck, of York state, to giv us more. I like to read good, sound, common sense. I will close by signing myself an old Infidel. I was born so. I am not to blame for it. Yours truly, W. G. CLARK.

TROY, NEW YORK, NOV. 5, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send postal order of $5. I hav been receiving the paper for a long time without remitting any money for the payment of it. Poverty was the prime cause, and I am more than thankful to you for not stopping the good old civilizer—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I was at the lectures of Watts and Chainey at Keenan Hall, this city, last Wednesday, and I must say I never before listened to so sound and logical arguments against priestcraft and kingcraft. They annihilated completely the cruel old Jew God and the myth called Christ. Fraternally yours,

JOHN MURRAY.

NORTH BAY, N. Y., NOV. 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Within you will find inclosed $1. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to my address, and ten copies of Mr. Remsburg's speech delivered at the Rochester convention. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best and most reliable paper that my eyes hav ever met with. I would like also to hav you send me the tract entitled "Paine Vindicated." The reason I call for this tract is that I want to convince an ignorant bigot that the rumor that Thomas Paine did on his deathbed renounce his faith in Infidelity is a notorious falsehood, intended for the destruction of his faith for the benefit of the entire body of the ministry. D. B. DAVIS.

CARROLL, IOWA, NOV. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. I must hav it regardless of cost. I was as good (or, more properly speaking, as bad) a Catholic as the next one until I was twenty-two years old. Then I began to think for myself, and the result has been one more earnest Freethinker in the ranks that I hope will in the near future succeed in making this glorious country of ours a land of the free and a home of the brave.

RICHARD CONWAY.

ALLIANCE, OHIO, NOV. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for two new subscribers. We, the Liberals of Alliance, hav a church with a free platform, known as the Independent church. We are doing a good work. We hav had a great many of the best minds to speak for us, such as George Chainey, Charles Watts, John E. Remsburg, A. B. Bradford, and a host of others. A word to the subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER: Let us work for it; it is the paper that is doing a good work. I will giv the subscriber the premium that the editor offers. I don't want it, and it will get a new subscriber. No Liberal ought to be without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I giv my paper, when read, to some one else to read. I don't think it a good way to store them away, as some do. If you will send me some back numbers I will giv them away to some who may possibly subscribe. JOS. FITZPATRICK.

LOOKING GLASS, OREGON, NOV. 16, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: We send our mite in support of your valuable paper another year. Would hav done so before, but for our sad affliction in the loss of two in our family, the oldest and youngest of our children.

Samuel H. Ward, born Feb. 29, 1864, died July 4, 1883; on July 3d, while taking a ride, was thrown from his horse, receiving injuries in the head which caused congestion of the brain. He lingered until the fourth, when he passed calmly away.

Waify W. Ward, our sweet little baby, after an illness of five days, quietly went to sleep in her mother's arms. We can at least hope they hav gone to join each other in a better life. Funeral service was read at the grave of each, Form 4, in "The Truth Seeker Collection," being used. The reading and other service were rendered by Prof. Thomas, a Liberal minded, practical Christian man, who was willing to dispense with prayer and conduct the services as we desired. Yours respectfully, F. WARD.

PRESCOTT, IOWA, NOV. 6, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: You will find herewith $1, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER. Notwithstanding what has been said, or written, by E. C. Walker and one or two others who assume the right to direct the Liberals what to do and with whom to work politically, permit me, an old subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and a Freethinker of many years, to say that I know of no Liberal man or woman who has not been bitten by the "worm of the still," that is not in favor of the prohibition movement in Iowa and elsewhere. Mr. Jamieson, in his recent letter touching a whisky plank in a Liberal platform, has expressed my sentiments, and those of many of my Infidel friends.

Hoping that THE TRUTH SEEKER will never espouse the cause of drunkard-makers, though it may occasionally permit some one to wail the expiring groan of the dram-shop, I am

Respectfully yours, E. CLARKE.

AYER, MASS., NOV. 26, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I am most agreeably surprised to see your, and our, very valuable paper conducted with such vigor since the death of its able and honored progenitor. It is difficult to tell where Bennett's mantle rested on the present management. The editorials and contributions are all par excellence, and are destined to be a light to those who sit in darkness—who dare not open their eyes to the light of reason. Seeing this "holy war" going on, for the rescue of the "town of man's soul," John Bunyan must feel and act like the man described in Acts, iii, 8. All the "gates" are surrendering, though "Mouth-gate" is slow to admit that "Eye" and "Ear-gates" hav been carried. But it is folly to talk in the face of evidence that declares your insincerity. Say, is bad boy (reformed good boy) qualifying for the ministry? He uses very persuasiv and convincing arguments when he attempts to convert Infidels. His persuasiv methods stimulate credulity clear beyond the bounds of reason, fable, and fiction. It is doubtful if he succeeds in the ministry, even though he showed sublime heroism and supreme courage in attacking a bound and helpless Infidel.

His brain is not constructed on the right plain. He is given to thinking, and don't know any better than to reason, and so gets running on and bestowing more thought on the scriptures than they will bear, and that will ruin him for the ministry. He would succeed best in the grocery business.

It requires honesty, brains, thought, and good judgment to be a successful grocery man.

E. MYRICH.

GRAND ISLAND, N. Y., NOV. 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2—$1.50 to continue my subscription, and fifty cents for a trial subscriber. Never stop my paper. If I hav not the wherewith to meet my subscription when my time expires, I will send it on as soon as convenient.

Let the light shine upon Christian barbarity until superstitious bigotry is superseded by the religion of the common brotherhood of man, and Christian gamblers, usurpers, and extortioners are made to stand out of the way of a progressiv people, and justice, liberty, and humanity guide and govern the minds of the rulers of the world; till the well-being of the whole human family becomes supreme and is paramount to the greed of a Christian hog that wants a million times more than he can use, and the privilege to get it by legalized extortion, calling it business. "Get rich by cunning, craft, fraud, corruption, or oppression, or any other means within the pale of the law; but work for it—never!" is the motto of the average church-goer of to-day. Selah.

WALTER SIMONDS.

ST. CATHARINES, NOV. 12, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed with this please find $3 to apply on my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and twenty cents for two copies of "The Fall and Redemption," by C. Watts, and one copy of "False Claims," by J. E. Remsburg; and hav the goodness to pass along the letter directed to Mr. Handy, and much oblige. There is a screw loose somewhere between here and your office, for three copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER hav failed to reach me within a few weeks. I hope they may benefit the person or persons who hav taken them; notwithstanding I would prefer to hav the first perusal of them, they being my Bible reading for Sunday.

The gospel according to Wakeman, Putnam, Bell, Heddon, Slenker, Andrews, Watts, Remsburg, Chainey, Hacker, York, Wixon, and various others out of mind, I don't like to miss the reading of. Am much pleased with the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER. This is from one who would rejoice in the prohibition in full of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors and tobacco, for they are the greatest curse that has ever befallen the human race. It is the only true remedy.

Thine for truth and freedom of thought in everything, C. B. THOMPSON.

DANVILLE, WIS., NOV. 6, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. Hav been among its constant readers ever since its inception at Paris, Ill., and during all that time it has been my favorit among all the papers I hav taken. Although descended from a line of ancestry noted for the strictness of their Christian disciplin, I hav been a firmly established Materialist of the T. Winter type for over forty years, but still I delight to read articles on airy or speculativ questions or theories, such as Spiritualism, psychology, mesmerism, Universology, theosophy, Occultism, apparitions, dreams, etc.; also on the origin and evolution of worlds and species, spontaneous generation, and the causes leading to the extinction of the several well-known defunct animal species, as well as on all subjects pertaining to sociology, like love, courtship, and marriage, animal magnetism, human affinities, with now and then an Infidel romance by Elmina or some other brilliant novelist. The above specified topics, with occasional biographical sketches of illustrious men and women, obituaries, funeral addresses, and Freethought sentiments tenderly and befittingly expressed at the graves of departed friends, together with the other usual make-up of THE TRUTH SEEKER, form a variety of choice reading matter that is keenly relished by myself and family.

To send you a list of names to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to I think would be entirely useless, as very many of my Liberal neighbors would gladly subscribe for the paper did they not dread the rumpus it would make with their women folks at home. The most of them hardly dare to carry their borrowed Infidel papers home to read.

Yours respectfully, J. W. HARTLEY.

BRONSTON, KY., NOV. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for about three years, and hav received and read nearly every number during that time. I now inclose $3—$2.50 for another year's subscription, and 50 cents for "The Bible Balanced," by George Darling.

I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and think it does right in giving all a fair hearing. It is one of the grandest missions of man to seek for and follow the truth in all things. If we liv after death, I would be not only willing but anxious to believe it. I hav been reading and watching the discussions between Spiritualists and Materialists very closely. I believe friend Winter and others hav the best of it so far. It looks to me that if the doctrin of Spiritualism be true, its advocates ought to demonstrate it so that there would be no doubters. A few years ago there were plenty of men who did not believe that a message could be sent over the wires by telephone. Now there are no doubters on that score. I believe that no man can help what he honestly believes. This is about the first thing that led me away from the Christian church—the idea that a man would be damned or saved according to his belief. I saw directly that it was unjust.

The ownership of land is a good question, or will be, for future generations. Much depends on it. My notion is that no man should be allowed to own more land than he actually needs for the business that he follows. This would cut off land speculators, and giv every man a chance to own at least enough to build himself a dwelling-house upon. Such a law would be just, and would inspirit the masses, and do more to suppress drunkenness and crime than all the prohibitory laws that ever hav been enacted. You see that it would be an easy matter for a committee of just men to determin how much land any man needed for any business. As the law is now, a man can buy any number of acres that he is able to pay for, and hold it to the great detriment of society. I. N. BROWN.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tab on my paper that I am running in debt to you since the 1st of this month. Please excuse. You will find inclosed $3, which place to my credit as far as it will go, to pay for the best paper in existence.

OLYMPIA, W. T., NOV. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4.50—$2.50 is for one years subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to be sent to E. T. Young; and the other $2 is our subscription to the Monument Fund, to be erected to the memory of D. M. Bennett, the world's greatest and most Liberal worker.

Very respectfully yours, ERNEST RIVARD.

ROCKFORD, NOV. 21, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50 for your paper for 1884. You say take advantage of cheap rates. I think the paper is really worth $3, and if I could not afford it at $2 50, I should put it back again to the old price; people would be just as well satisfied. I am poor, but I find it just as easy to pay for my paper in advance as after I hav had it a year; and I believe everyone else could if they would commence that way, and it would make it so much more pleasant for the publishers. With great respect for all interested in this excellent paper,

MRS. D. B. MILLER.

NORTH YAMHILL, OR., NOV. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: The world moves, and man and woman, too, progress. Last Thursday, the 15th, at Olympia, the capital of Washington Territory, the council—the upper house of the territorial legislature—passed the bill which the lower house had previously passed, by two majority, giving women the ballot in all elections in that territory. It will most certainly become a law, as Gov. Newell is an avowed advocate of the enfranchisment of women. Another feather in the cap of Liberalism.

Yours for freedom, without regard to sex, color, or previous condition of servitude, L LAUGHLIN.

SALINA, N. Y., NOV. 27, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: By the kindness of a friend I hav been receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of weeks. I like it for the principles it advocates, and especially for the freedom given to the discussion on both sides of any questions discussed in your paper. One of your correspondents has tired of the discussion of Materialism and Spiritualism. I do not know of any better way to arrive at the truth of these questions than discussion, unless we hav made up our minds that we will believe one or the other regardless of any future light.

Inclosed you will find $2.50 to pay for one year's subscription. CHARLES BAILEY.

SOUTH MILFORD, IND., NOV. 23, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50, for which please send to my address one volume of Barlow's "Voices," and William H. Mallock's work, "Is Life Worth Living?" I am doing a little missionary work in the cause of Freethought, by distributing books and papers among the benighted heathens of Christian mythology in this vicinity, and hav had many a hard tussle with that old fossil, theology, and if I hav not made any actual converts, I at least hav succeeded in opening the eyes of some to its absurdities. How any intelligent man or woman can believe in, and teach children, such a diabolical doctrin, is a mystery too deep for me. I could hav no heart to look into the innocent faces of my children and tell them of the terrible agonies of an endless hell that awaited them. I could not tell them that I, knowing all this, had been instrumental in their existence, and in subjecting them to endless torture; that it was now their sacred duty to try to please an unreasonable, unjust, all-powerful God, and stand one chance in ten thousand to get into the kingdom of heaven. These Christian reflections would be untold agonies to me, when I clasp these little innocent forms to my breast, and feel their pure kisses on my face; I would curse God, the author of such inhuman and diabolical conditions.

Your excellent paper finds a warm welcome in our home, and I wish that it may find its way into every home in the land, and that its grand truths may sink deep into the heart of every man and woman, until each and all may do right for right's sake, and not through fear of the inhuman tyranny of a Christian God. Yours for truth, N. M. KELLAM.

ONEKAMA, MICH., NOV. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, commencing Jan. 1, 1884. I send it now because I hav it, and because you need it, I presume. I derive a good deal of information from your correspondence, especially the prohibitionists and the anti-prohibitionists, as they appear to be the most exciting. The prohibitionists that attacked Mr. Walker, are determined to first put him in a false position, and then argue from that position. I am a prohibitionist from a higher motiv than whisky-drinking. I find the inventiv genius of mankind stimulated by opposing appetite, pocket, or life. It starts them to thinking how they can evade or protect. That sest the brain at work, and work produces strength. After gaining sufficient strength by evading, the brain is then capable of higher work; then it will commence building up. If you will look back you will find that, since prohibition laws hav been passed, Freethought has kept pace. It could be called unconscious evolution.

Yonrs truly, I. S. WEEKS.

PORTVILLE, NOV. 25, 283.

MR. EDITOR: You never will know, I hope, the sorrow and mortification I hav felt at being obliged to withhold my subscription for the last year's TRUTH SEEKER, but I will try to make amends by paying for last year, and also a year in advance. I cannot do without it. I hav been a constant reader of your paper ever since it was published in New York, and think you can safely count on me as a life subscriber.

I see by your issue of Nov. 10th that Brother H. L. Green has been doing some good work at Port Allegheny, which is twenty miles from here. But I think he must hav forgotten that I liv on the direct route to his home, and my wife and I would hav been glad to hav entertained him for a short time. We miss such chances more from the fact that there is but one other member of the New York State Association of Freethinkers, or Freethinker of any kind, within ten miles of here, and that is Brother John Coats, of this place. So you see wife and I prize the kindly face of any good, intelligent truth seeker. And right here let me say that we are Spiritualists. The one thing we prize the highest in your management of THE TRUTH SEEKER is your generous treatment of all classes of opinions, and from that I think Brother Bennett's mantle has fallen on worthy shoulders. I had the pleasure of a handshake with Brother Eugene Macdonald at the Rochester Convention, and hope to meet him again next month at Salamanca. J. L. BROOKS.

EAST CHATHAM, N. Y., NOV. 29, 1883.

MY DEAR FRIEND HARRY BENDER: Notwithstanding you are to this date an entire stranger to me, inasmuch as you, in the fearless, outspoken TRUTH SEEKER of November 24th, in a short communication, hav alluded to an article of mine in the same journal of June 9th, 1883, you will excuse me for asking permission to address an open letter to you through the same medium, as the pleasure and gratification I now enjoy from week to week in perusing these letters and communications afford me more real social enjoyment than I receive from all other sources outside of my family circle. In fact, when we refer to the church history of the past, even in my day (say nothing of the tortures and executions of earlier days), the divisions, contentions, and bitter feelings that hav divided societies, neighborhoods, and even families, it is heart-refreshing to even correspond with those who can fully indorse that noble sentiment so beautifully expressed by Thomas Paine: "The world is my country, my brethren all mankind;" and I am sure that standing upon this broad platform there is more real joy and satisfaction than there can be in trying to defend the Bible faith and patching up the old garments of orthodoxy.

Your friend, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, asks: "What better belief is offered than the Bible givs?" Please let him read Numbers xxxiii, and particularly verses 17 and 18. Just think of the horror and brutality of putting these male children to death, in the presence of their mothers and sisters, after leaving their fathers and husbands slaughtered on the battle-field; and, to fill the measure of beastly cruelty to overflowing, think of the finishing command, to wit: "Kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him; but all the women children that hav not known man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselvs." And if his nerves can stand the pressure of the investigation, think of the beastly ordeal those poor females must hav passed through while their captors were deciding which should exist in a life of degradation in their hands, which were still red with the blood of their fathers and little brothers.

Think you that they could adopt the Christian faith, and feelingly and honestly say, "The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away; blessed be the name of the Lord," and yet bear in mind that Moses says the Lord commanded it? If this hard account stood alone, we would try to pass over it in silence; but the Old Testament is filled with barbarian cruelty of this kind, and I will take the liberty to say to your friend, the secretary, that if he will rely entirely on his own instinctiv light of right and justice, he will hav a far better guide than this book, written in an ignorant, barbarous age. He will also remember that this Moses is frequently alluded to in the New Testament, to wit: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so shall the son of man be lifted up."

Now, I hav no more faith in the healing efficacy of the brazen serpent of Moses than I hav that an infinit, merciful God commanded him to kill all those affectionate mothers and inoffensiv, dimple-cheeked male children.

The next allusion to Moses in the New Testament that now occurs to my mind is represented as one of the parables given by Christ as a similitude of fact, describing poor Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, and the rich man agonizing in the torments of hell, but still retaining his affection and solicitude for his brethren on earth, desiring permission to notify them of his awful condition, that they might escape his doom.

Was there ever a divine favor of more importance asked? Who that has witnessed the religious controversies in churches, neighborhoods, and even families, but has uttered similar desires? How well I remember the early struggles of the Campbellites, or Christians, as they were called, against their bigoted persecutors; also the split in the Quaker church near where I lived, among whom I had grandparents, uncles, aunts, and cousins, and for a season discord and enmity reigned supreme.; but no instruction from the rich man; the stern reply was, "No, no! you hav Moses and the prophets, and if you will not heed these, you would not though one should raise from the dead."

But as we hav already given you some idea of Moses's humanity and divine intelligence, let us glance for a moment at the clearness and reliability of some of the prophets. Commence at chapter first of Ezekiel, and read as far as your patience will permit, not omitting the fourth chapter, from verse 12 to 15, and see what kind of fuel Ezekiel was compelled by order of the deity to bake his cake with. Alas! alas! how clear! What more can we mortals ask, to unveil the mysteries of the future?—and we will quote no further in this direction.

From the tenor of your short letter I conclude you are one of the hardy sons of toil, upon whose shoulders rest the prosperity and happiness of this generation and the hopes of those who are to succeed us, as I consider it a self-evident truth that industry and frugality, with an untrammeled mind, coupled with love and good will toward humanity, are the great reliable sources or fountains of human happiness, while idleness, bigotry, and superstition work in an opposit direction.

Respectfully and truly yours, JOHN M. BARNES.

CALISTOGA, CAL., NOV. 18, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to add my mite to the evidence collecting in favor of Mr. Pritchard. I went to the mines because of his letter printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I went alone from here, and met four other Liberals at Rathdrun, Idaho, with whom I went in and saw Mr. Pritchard, after most of the Montana men had gone away. There were several other persons on the grounds who came from California, part of whom said some very hard things of Mr. Pritchard. But when I asked them if they could point to a single motiv that could induce Mr. Pritchard to invite his friends to such an outlandish country other than those contained in his letter, they frankly said they could not. Yet they were much disappointed at not finding plenty of gold. I found Mr. Pritchard kind-hearted and generous, ready to accommodate me or those with me. He went with us to show where we might get prospects, and offered to do still more, and I felt ready to accept his offers, but in conversation with my associates and two other persons who had found prospects, we all decided to go up Pritchard Creek and prospect, and thus I did not see Mr. Pritchard any more. The water was too high on the larger creeks, and on most of the side gulches it had run down too much for sluicing. We found large timber and too great a distance from supplies our chief obstacles, and had we remained with Mr. Pritchard, as he desired we should until the water went down, we might hav profited by it, as hav Mr. Craig and others who came later. Notwithstanding the cost of going and coming, time spent, etc., I believed Mr. Pritchard was an honest though perhaps mistaken, man; mistaken, if at all, in the quantity of gold to be found. Mr. Craig has described the country pretty well, and I remember him as one of the two men I met on the dry trail not far from Beaver Creek, as I was coming out. I hav heard from the digging from other sources, and find them corroborating the first impressions of Pritchard.

I would not, perhaps, hav written anything on this subject but for two reasons: First, because of my faith in THE TRUTH SEEKER and its friends; second, because it is only justice to Mr. Pritchard, after knowing what I do on both sides of the question. His desire that Liberals should control the mines in which he is so much interested was one cause of his being abused; another, at his not being able and willing to show them good diggings. But I hope now that all parties will secure a share of the treasure, and thus drop the feelings of dislike all around.

Respectfully yours, J. C. WEYBRIGHT.

Children's Corner.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

A Sad Mistake.

Harry Spencer was a bright, winsome, wide-awake lad when I knew him, a dozen years ago, full of fun and frolic, and sometimes mischief. You couldn't help liking him, for he was always good-natured and clever. He was generous hearted, and would turn his pockets inside out to find the last penny, to lend you if you wanted it, or to giv if you were needy and destitute.

He came in the house singing, and he went away singing, and, if he happened to catch a scolding, as all boys sometimes will, he would kiss the scolder, and say, "Well, I'm sorry, and I'll not do so any more."

"A bright, affectionate boy," said his aunt, "and I hope he'll turn out well." And such was the wish of every one who knew him, for he was a general favorit wherever he went.

"Turn out well!" No one had ever a thought that Harry could turn out ill, and when he looked at you, his great innocent brown eyes full of laughter and good-nature, you would hav felt willing to stake your life on his good behavior.

His address was such that, at an early age, he obtained a position in government employ, with a handsome salary, and every one was glad for him. I used to meet him occasionally at his business desk, and he always had some bright remark to make, and was ever the same genial, witty, laughing boy I knew of yore. He was the very picture of good health, a true type of physical, manly beauty, and when, he married Lizzie West, a sweet and noble girl, as handsome and healthy as himself, their future appeared as beautiful and glowing as one could wish.

After the marriage of Harry, I lost sight of him for awhile, but, unexpectedly, I met him one day, and I will tell you where. I had some business in another city, and, after it was finished, having some spare time before the train would leave, I inquired for some objects or places of interest where I might spend an hour or two, pleasantly and profitably.

"Ever been to jail?" inquired the gentleman with whom I was conversing.

I laughingly confessed that I had not.

"It's worth your while then, maybe," he said.

It was not "visiting day," however, and, it was only by a special permit from one of the superior officers that I obtained leave to pass within the inclosure of the jail. As the great iron door swung to, and I looked up to the high wall, a cold shudder went over me. The keeper conducted us along the damp, cheerless corridors, and into the women's department, and I shall always remember the sad, hopeless, dejected look of some of those women. There was one woman who was sentenced for life to that dreary existence. She had already lived over twenty years of her sentence, and was past seventy years of age. She was there for murder; she had killed her husband by poison. Her keen, cunning, gray eyes seemed to carry murder in them still, and I did not like to look at her. Her age and infirmities, and her general good conduct, would insure her a pardon, it was said, but there was nobody to ask for it, and nobody to receive her; not even her own daughter would take her as an inmate of her home, for she had threatened to take her life, too. So she was doomed to end her days in that cold stone cell, unloved, unhonored, and unwept. What a terrible fate! So it seemed to me; yet, excepting that sly, wandering, restless expression of the cold, gray eyes, the murderess appeared to bear her imprisonment with tolerable composure.

Passing on, we arrived at a cell door, somewhat apart from the rest, and, turning the key, the huge black door swung slowly back on its great hinges, revealing a narrow, dark, and gloomy cell, the only furniture of which was a hard board, perhaps six feet in length, by two feet in width, and slightly raised at one end.

"What is this?" I asked.

"This is the 'solitary,' the place of punishment for our disobedient ones. Step inside, if you wish, and think how it might seem to be in solitary."

With beating heart, I entered the low, narrow apartment, if so it might be called, and, in an instant, the iron door was closed upon me, and I heard the key grate in the lock. There I stood in that lonely tomb in pitch darkness, save a feeble ray of light that seemed as if retreating backward, frightened at the shadows it vainly sought to illumin by its presence. It seemed to me I was stifling, yet there was a ventilator, and a current of air from somewhere; but the thought of being entombed, locked up alive, even for a brief moment, and "just to see how it seemed," was oppressiv in the extreme, and almost intolerable to my sensitiv and nervous organization. Though I was there only a minute or two, it seemed an age, almost, when the key turned in the lock, and I stepped forth into freedom again, with a breath of relief.

"'Tisn't so bad after you get used to it," said the man, as he observed my white face, and gasping breath. "Why, we had one fellow in there nineteen days and nights on the stretch, once!"

"Oh, why did you keep him there so long, in that cruel dungeon?" I asked.

"Oh, he was disobedient, saucy, and anxious to fight; but when he came out he was pliable enough."

"But how could he sleep? There is no bed there."

The man laughed. "Oh, yes," and he pointed to the board; "there is the soft side of that pine board, there! And then we giv them dry bread and pure water three times a day—not a very rich diet, but wholesome," he observed. "One man lived eleven days in that hole without tasting a mouthful, but he was conquered, though, at last. But come, let us go on; you are getting nervous, I do believe."

As we walked on, the tears fell over my eyelids upon my face, to think that human beings must be subjected to such treatment, must be so punished for the sake of uncontroled evil passions. Pity and sorrow filled my mind because prisons and jails are necessary; yet while crime and wrong-doing exist, I could find in my heart only pity and grief for the unfortunate creatures of circumstances who ever entered such a place as a jail or prison. All at once I heard my name called faintly. I turned quickly, and inquired, "Did some one speak my name?"

"Yes!" was the reply. "Look in here; this prisoner has a larger room than the other, and has a few more privileges; I don't know why, though, unless it is because he is such a pleasant lad, but we keep him close under lock and key, however."

Through the narrow aperture in the door, I saw the face of—Harry Spencer! No longer rosy and buoyant with happiness, but pale, haggard, and prematurely old. He put one thin white hand through the little square opening, and clasped the hand that I extended toward him, while his lips trembled and great scalding tears dropped from his sorrowful eyes.

"You poor boy," was all I could say.

"I deserve it all, dear friend," he said, huskily, "but, oh, it is so hard, so hard!"

I tried to comfort him as well as I could, but he would not be comforted.

"I am suffering the penalty of wrong-doing," he said, "but, oh, I suffer so much, shut in here away from the sunlight and the sweet, pure air, and apart from my dear Lizzie—locked up, day after day, night after night, alone with my thoughts."

"It is sad, Harry," I said, tenderly, "but it is not forever. Be brave and hopeful for the future, which is, to every one, full of promis and sweet anticipation. But how did it happen, Harry?"

"I will tell you," he said, with all his old frankness. "I enjoyed the confidence of my employers to an unsual extent, but, instead of valuing it as I should, I took advantage—an unjust, and cruel advantage—of their kindness; yet I never thought of doing them an injury in the way I did, until, in an evil moment, I hearkened to the voice of one who was not a true friend, although, in my ignorance, I supposed he was. I trace my downfall to my first glass of strong drink. From that, I went on to the gaming table. I played with my own money first, until I lost it, and gambling had become a wild passion. Then he who said he was my friend whispered that it would be easy to find more money where my salary came from. I hesitated, turned back, and then robbed my employers. Still, I did not think of it, then, as robbery, and I meant to pay it all back in time, for I hoped to be successful at cards. From small sums, I took larger ones, and went on, bearing a burden that tortured me more than words can tell, until—until," he sobbed, "I hav brought up in such a dreadful place as this. And as hard as this confinement is," he said, "I know I deserve it all—all."

Poor Harry—poor boy!

How many hav fallen in just the same way by the same means! Temptation comes, and the weak totter beneath its subtle influence, stumble, and fall.

It was through the influence of those that he had wronged that Harry's sentence was made light, compared to the offense or crime, and they had succeeded in having him sentenced to the jail instead of the state prison.

Since my visit to the jail, a pardon has been secured for Harry, and to-day he is a free man once more. Kind friends found for him employment, and Harry is striving to win money enough to pay back the sum he took unlawfully. He has passed through a terrible experience, an experience that can never be blotted from his life. The hue of health has come back to his cheek, but his smile is subdued and half sorrowful, and the grave look in his eyes seems ever to refer to that sad mistake of his life.

He has long years before him to retrieve that dreadful error of his early days, but its shadow must ever follow him. Do you, dear ones, who read this, aim to liv honestly and truly, keeping always straight on in the one true path of right, shunning the intoxicating cup and the influence of evil companions, and thus avoid the road that leads to sorrow and suffering. It is better to be honest and trustworthy than to be a king, and he who is honest and trustworthy is happier than a king.

About Talking.

Among the common errors in the use of language are these: The mispronouncing of unaccented syllables, as terruble for terrible; the omission of a letter or short syllable as goin' for going, ev'ry for every; and the running of words together without giving to every one a separate and distinct pronunciation.

I know a boy who says "Don't wanter" when he means, "I don't want to;" "Whatier say?" when he means "What did you say?" and "Where de go?" instead of "Where did he go?"

Sometimes you hear "ficood," instead of "If I could;" "Wilfercan" instead of "I will if I can;" and "Howjerknow?" for "How do you know?"

And hav you never heard "m-m" instead of "yes" and "ni-ni" instead of "no?"

Let me giv you a short conversation I heard the other day between two pupils of our high school, and see if you never heard anything similar to it:

"Wherejergolasnight?"

"Hadder skate."

"Jerfind th' ice hard'n' good?"

"Yes; hard 'nough."

"Jer goelone?"

"Na; Bill'n Joe wenterlong."

"Howlate jerstay?"

"Pastate."

"Lemmeknow wenyergoagin, woncher? I wantergo'n show yer howterskate."

"H—m, ficoodn't skate better'n you I'd sell out'nquit."

"Well, we'll tryerace'nseefyercan."

Here they took different streets and their cenversation ceased. These boys write their compositions grammatically, and might use good language and speak it distinctly if they would try. But they hav got into a careless way of speaking, and make no effort to get out of it. Whenever they try to speak correctly they hav to grope their way along slowly, and their expression seems forced or cramped as though it were hard work for them to talk.—Selected.

Notices of Our Two New Pamphlets.

CRIMES OF PREACHERS IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA, BETWEEN 1876 AND 1883. Third edition. Published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Price 25 cents.

I am glad to see that Mr. Billings has got out a new edition of this valuable work giving us the carefully compiled and statistically arranged list of crimes committed by clerical, canting, carping, caviling, and chasteless villains calling themselvs men of God and ministers of the most holy one.

Nothing will serve sooner to break the backbone of theology than to destroy the halo of reverential awe with which these priestly pietists hav always surrounded themselvs. Once throw off the Mokanna-like veil by which their hypocritical and horrid features are hidden, and let their dupes see them as they are, and the work is done.

I can gaze back some thirty years ago, and see in the dim distance how the preacher was looked upon with reverence and awe; how little children would run behind mother when they saw the "man of God" coming, and how they feared to even speak in his holy presence. But there were better reasons then for looking up to this class of people than there are now, for they were the educated class, as well the go-betweens betwixt men and their gods. Their advice was sought by whole congregations, and if the preacher said so it was a fact, sure as fate. But now that education is becoming the general property of rich and poor, all are more on a level, and we are learning to reverence humanity at large, instead of a few self-styled sky-pilots. We are learning that gods and ghosts are the big boos that these teacher-preachers hav used to scare their dupes with, and keep them in subjection, while they draw from them their hard earnings in the shape of tithes and Peter's pence. But thanks to such books as this of Mr. Billings's, these servants of God are fast finding themselvs with their occupation gone, their churches empty, and they obliged to labor in some other vocation for their bread and butter.

It is not a pleasant work, this of showing up the dark side of even teachers of darkness. But truth must come to the front, though all else be crushed in the effort. This monstrous he mythology, called Christianity, must go to the wall, and all its he-gods, he-devils, and he-heavens must giv place to a blessed reality here on earth, when equality of sex shall be the watchword, and the mother shall stand equal with the father, and the sister with the brother.

Just see in this book of Mr. Billings's how woman has suffered from priestly lust and priestly brutality. Out of 2,053 crimes of preachers, 849 are against women in a sexual way, and the total against women are 1,113—over half of all of them! I am determined, for my part, that from this day on I will make more of an effort to sell and circulate this book than any other one found in the list of Freethought publications. If I could afford it I would send it broadcast over the land, so that even in the remotest hovel the inmates thereof might see the plain facts therein set forth, and judge of the foulness of the religion by the record made by its preachers. Come on, friends, and fight the foe of humanity! Crush superstition under your foot, and crush all that tends to teach error, delusion, and falsehood.

"With still the inextinguishable glance,
And the clenched and lifted fist,
And your foot on the neck of the menacing one,
The scorner utterly crushed beneath you,
The menacing, arrogant one, that strode and advanced
With his senseless scorn, bearing the murderous knife,
The wide-swelling one, the braggart that would yesterday do so much,
To-day a carrion dead and damned,
The despised of all the earth,
An offal rank, to the dunghill maggots spurned. —Leaves of Grass.

Nov. 24, 283. ELMINA.

From the Boston Investigator.

If you wish to see a list of proved criminals among the clergy, read Col. Billings's book entitled, "The Crimes of Preachers," about a thousand of them in six years! Such a frightful black list we never read before, and yet there are probably not a few left of the same sort, leading a sinner almost to believe that if there is a God in Israel he is not very vigilant in keeping his clergy in the bee-line of rectitude, for the way that the 1,000 "cut up" is fearful to read about!

From the American Nonconformist.

Until Mr. Billings undertook the unpleasant but much needed task of reducing this class of criminals into tabular form, they contrived to escape public notoriety, and by virtue of the sanctity of their positions palmed themselvs off as the safest and purest of men.

When the facts are reduced to tables, they are proven to be the most unsafe and the most criminally criminal of any profession.

This work of Mr. Billings is proof against the charge of falsehood. It givs the names of the ministerial criminals, their residences, their denomination, the crimes charged, and the dates. The summing up shows 2,053 crimes collected in this book, of which 1,113 were committed against women.

This book is a most shocking record. It ought to be in the hands of every member of the so-called Christian church in the land, in which case that institution would soon come to an inglorious end.

From the Liberal.

A copy of the third edition of this great book by M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa, was received at the Liberal office last Saturday. It is to Christianity one of the most damaging publications extant. It contains the names of several hundred criminals, all preachers, and the crime charged. Mr. Billings has collected the facts upon which the work is based from the careful reading of four newspapers, and the casual reading of seven, making a total of eleven papers, published in the states of Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, and believes he has not collected one-half, as he took no particular pains. No attention has been paid to the Southern and Pacific states. As it is very common for Christians to assert that Infidelity causes crimes, it would be well for every Liberal to possess a copy of this book. Mr. Billings makes a very significant Bible selection as a motto for his book—"By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles?"

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. By John E. Remsburg. Price 10 cents; 75 cents per dozen.

From the American Nonconformist.

We are exceedingly glad to state that the speech of John E. Remsburg, delivered before the New York Freethinkers' Association at Rochester, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1883, and from which we quoted so freely in our issue of Oct. 25th, is published in pamphlet form, entitled "False Claims." Its value to all who are seeking for the truth cannot be over-estimated. Send to office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 33 Clinton Place, N. Y.

From the Liberal.

This is the greatest of Mr. Remsburg's books. It is, without doubt, the most powerful and effectiv Infidel pamphlet in the English language. Like wine, Mr. Remsburg improves as he grows older, though of all his productions we know of none that does not rank high.

And he has ruthlessly dissected the "holy scriptures" in accordance therewith.

THE DANISH CURE EXPLAINED

BY WILHELMINE D. SCHOTT,

Practitioner of the Danish Cure.

WITH PORTRAIT OF AUTHOR.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

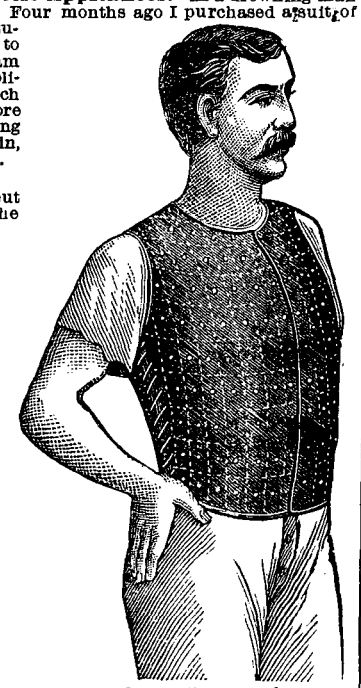
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

The Labarum of Constantine.

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders: and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN's edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

LET justice and right be the standard by which we govern our actions, and never forget that the grandest thing a man can perform is to do what is right under all circumstances.—D. M. Bennett.

THE smoke ascends
To heaven as lightly from the cottage hearth
As from the haughty palace. He whose soul
Ponders this true equality may walk
The fields of earth with gratitude and hope;
Yet, in that meditation, will he find
Motiv to sadden grief, as we hav found—
Lamenting ancient virtues overthrown,
And for the injustice grieving, that hath made
So wide a difference betwixt man and man.
—Wordsworth's Excursion.

I WILL never resign my opinions for interest, though I would cheerfully abandon them on conviction. My reason, such as it is, can only be controled by better reason, to which I am ever open. As to my freedom of thought, speech, and action, I shall ever say what Charles XII. wrote under the Map of Riga: "Dieu me l'adonne; le Diable ne me l'otera pas." [God gave it me, and the devil shan't take it away.] —Gibbon.

GOOD reasons must, of force, giv place to better.—Shakspere.

WHY is a small moiety, with no peculiar claim on society, so highly favored, taken for a while from the dust and pressure of the world, and set apart in calm academic retreats like these, that here they may hav access to the best learning of the time? Not certainly that we should waste these precious hours in sloth, neither that we should merely make our bread by learning; nor that we should seek and enjoy it as a selfish luxury, and, piquing ourselvs on the enlightenment and refinement it brings, look down with disdain on the illiterate crowd; but that, when we hav been cultivated ourselvs, we should go into the world and do what we can to impart to others whatever good thing we ourselvs hav received. There is a temptation incident to the studious to seclude themselvs from others, and lose themselvs in their own thoughts and books. But we must try to resist this, and remember that since we hav freely received, we are bound freely to giv. This it is which makes culture a really honorable and beneficent power.—Principal Shairp's Culture and Religion.

WE know that acts are good or bad only as they affect the actors or others. We know that from every good act good cousequences flow, and that from every bad act there are only evil results. Every virtuous deed is a star in the moral firmament. There is in the moral world, as in the physical, the absolute and perfect relation of cause and effect. For this reason the atonement becomes an impossibility. Others may suffer by your crime, but their suffering cannot discharge you; it simply increases your guilt, and adds to your burden. For this reason happiness is not a reward—it is a consequence. Suffering is not a punishment—it is a result.—Ingersoll.

WHY should men dispute concerning the reality of virtue, and whether it be founded on the nature of things (which yet surely is not matter of question), when every man carries about him the passion of resentment, which affords him demonstration that the rules of justice and equity are to be the guide of his actions? For every man naturally feels an indignation upon seeing instances of villainy and baseness, and therefore cannot commit the same without being self-condemned.—Bishop Butler.

IF observation, experience, and history teach anything clearly and unmistakably, it is that the strongest and most intense faith in religious dogmas may coexist with the gravest immorality. We see it exemplified in the lives of men to-day. It has been so in the past. "A wager might be laid," says Mommsen, in his "History of Rome," "that the more lax any woman was, the more piously she worshiped Isis." Corinth of antiquity was as full of religion as of wine. The Byzantine empire under Christianity existed nearly eleven centuries. Faith abounded and skepticism was unknown. Yet of that empire Lecky says: "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, without a single exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed."—Underwood's Materialism and Crime.

EARTH, that nourished thee, shall claim
Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again;
And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
Their individual being, shalt thou go
To mix for ever with the elements;
To be a brother to the insensible rock,
And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
Turns with his share and treads upon.
—Bryant's Thanatopsis.

THE various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as equally true, by the philosopher as equally false, and by the magistrate as equally useful.—Gibbon.

IT is only those who feel a deep interest in, and affection for, this world, who will work resolutely for its amelioration; those whose affections are transferred to heaven acquiesce easily in the miseries of earth; giv them up as hopeless, as befitting, as ordained; and console themselvs with the idea of the amends which are one day to be theirs. If we had looked upon this earth as our only scene, it is doubtful if we should so long hav tolerated its more monstrous anomalies and more culpable evils. But it is easier to look to a future paradise than to strive to make one upon earth; and the depreciating and hollow language of preachers has played into the hands both of the insincerity and the indolence of men.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THIS world is all a fleeting show,
For man's illusion given;
The smiles of joy, the tears of woe,
Deceitful shine, deceitful flow—
There's nothing true but heaven!
Poor wanderers of a stormy day,
From wave to wave we're driven,
And fancy's flash and reason's ray
Serve but to light the troubled way—
There's nothing calm but heaven!
—Moore.

Odds and Ends.

GILPIN, reading in a paper that "facts are stubborn things," says there's no particle of doubt but that his wife is a fact.

TWO men passed an undertaker's shop. Said one, "That's the last business I want to go into." Said the other, "That's what it will be."

THE turning of a woman into a pillar of salt was fair enough. Everything was done by Lot, and after the drawing he had a chance to get a fresh wife.

A NOTICE of a certain lecturer states that "he always carries his audience with him." We thought, when we heard him, he'd hav to if he wanted to hav any.

DURING the thick fog the other evening Gom Gom took a poor blind man by the arm and led him to his door. Telling the story to a friend on the following day, he cried, "It is terrible to be blind in such a fog!"

THE christening of an infant archduchess of Austria occurred lately. This fact came by cable. The name of the royal infant will be sent over by steamer as soon as the royal secretaries get it copied.

"WEATHER strips," says an advertisment which may be seasonable, although everybody knows that warm weather is most conducive to the stripping process. But come to think of it, cold weather strips the trees.

"DO you ever gamble?" she asked, as they sat together, her hand in his. He replied, "No; but if I wanted to, now would be my time." "How so?" "Because I hold a beautiful hand." The engagement is announced.

LADY visitor: "Is your mistress at home?" Servant (religiously inclined): "Yes, mum, but she's too busy to see yer." Lady visitor: "Then she's not at home?" Servant: "Fact is, mum, I can't lie under $20 a month—and I won't."

JACK has gone off and got himself lost, and he has also found himself and walked home. "Are you not sorry that you ran away and got lost?" asked the paternal ancestor with a tone of grief and reproval. "I wasn't lost." "But nobody knew where you was." "I knew where I was myself." That settled it. A boy that knows where he is himself can never get lost.

"MIKE, now that you hav renounced your former faith, and joined our church," said a Protestant preacher to a newly admitted Hibernian member, "you must abstain from swearing." "Oi will, sor." "You must not go fishing on Sunday, either." "Oi will not, sor." "I desire to use you as an example, and when one of your former associates asks you why you joined my church, I want you to giv him a good answer." "Thrust me for that, sor." "I am glad to hear you speak so. Now, suppose me to be one of the men who work at the brickyard," and he stepped off a few paces, and then advancing, said: "Hello, Mike." "Hello, yersilf." "I understand that you hav joined the Protestant church." "Oi hev." "What were your reasons for doing so?" "None av yer d——d business."

PASS the pork and beans, dear mother,
For I'm hungry as a mule:
True, I had an oyster supper,
But to me it was like gruel.

But Adolph was there, dear mother,
And I fain would hav him think
I am ethereal in my make up,
And am trying to get his chink.

I only ate a wee bit morsel
Of a dainty frosted cake,
One small peanut and a raisin—
Gave all solid grub the shake.

Pile the provender around mo,
I'm starving, ma'am, by gum;
Ain't the pork and beans delicious?
Lordy! Lordy!—yum! yum! yum!
—Boston Girl,

"LOOK here, young man," said a Cambridge parent to his daughter's lover when the latter entered the parlor to make his first call of the indoors season the other night; "look here, you burnt up a good deal of coal and kerosene last winter, coming around here and staying till 10 and 10:30 two or three nights a week. Now, I've no objection to your visits, as you are a respectable young man; but you've got to find your own fuel and lights this coming winter. I cannot afford to keep fires running and a lamp burning in this parlor all the winter." "All right, sir," responded the young man. "I am willing to share the expense, but you should hardly ask me to bear the whole of it. Suppose you furnish the coal, and I furnish the light. How would that do?" "All right," said the parent, as he turned to leave the room. "I am willing to bear my share of the expense if you bear yours." "Let's see," said the clear-headed youth, as he sat down by his lady love. "How much oil did we burn last winter, Sadie?" "Why, John," she replied with a blush, "we didn't burn a lampful during the whole winter."

OLD Mrs. Grimes is dead. Alas!
We ne'er shall see her more,
She was the wife of good old Grimes,
Who died some years before.

A very worthy dame is gone,
Since she gave up her breath;
Her head was white with frosts of time,
She lived until her death.

Though rough the path, her willing feet
E'er walked where duty led;
And never wore a pair of shoes,
Except when out of bed.

Busy was she, from morn till night,
Spite of old Time's advances;
In easy circumstances.

Good Mrs. Grimes is now at rest,
She'll rest through endless ages;
The sun has set, her work is done,
She's gone to claim her wages.

Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 10. No. 50. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, December 15, 1883. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $2.50 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE constitution of Michigan prohibits any form of religious service in either house of her legislature. Consequently no chaplain is elected.

IT is alleged that, although the Vatican archives are now open to heretics, everything which it is not expedient that they shall see has been put aside.

AN English vicar has taken to the lecture field in order to reconcile science and religion, by arguing that pre-Adamite remains are nothing more nor less than fossil angels.

MRS. RUTH EVERETT, of Salt Lake City, says that the Utah women who signed the petition to Congress protesting against any further legislation upon polygamy did so under coercion.

A SPLIT has occurred in the church of John Jasper, the famous "sun-do-move" preacher. Brother Jasper defies the recusant members, and declares that he can run his church alone.

COLONEL INGERSOLL recently received a letter from an Ohio man, covering ninety pages of foolscap, pasted end to end. The writer wished to hav a friendly argument with the Infidel.

SOMEBODY writes to the New York Sun to inquire if Senator Ingalls, who is to be made president of the Senate, is an Infidel. Mr. Dana very sensibly replies that Mr. Ingalls's belief is nobody's business but his own.

MR. NEAL DOW says that in more than three-fourths of Maine the liquor traffic has been swept away, no spirits being distilled or beer brewed. There are low, secret liquor shops in the large towns, and in Bangor the law is not recognized or obeyed.

POPE LEO has made the editor of a Charleston, S. C., newspaper a knight of the order of St. George on account of the stand his paper has taken against dueling. The Chicago News understands that this notable appointment will not interfere with the editor's cordial support of that gentleman for sheriff who givs him the most eloquent resources about the county printing.

SOME time ago, when it was proposed to place a statue of King Victor Emanuel of Italy in the Pantheon at Rome, the pope threatened that if the project were carried out he would declare the Pantheon a pagan temple. To avoid a conflict with the church the government has decided to place the statue in one of the lateral chapels of that structure. The government of Italy is destitute of backbone.

THE detectivs are again telling the story of the revival that occurred in the jail in Hartford, Conn. The prisoners held their religious meetings in a room given them for that purpose. The zeal ran especially to music, and the songs were of the shouting kind. Great progress was made, and an abundant harvest seemed certain; but it accidentally was discovered that the sick absentees were busily sawing the bars in another cell.

WHILE making improvements at Cole's Hill, near Plymouth, Mass., recently, the workmen discovered the graves of a number of Pilgrims who came to America in the Mayflower, and who were buried during the first winter after their arrival. One of the graves was opened, and contained the skeleton of a middle-aged man, five feet nine inches in hight. These are the only graves of the first settlers which hav been positivly identified; and tablets will mark the exact location.

THE editor of the Danville Tribune offers up his acknowledgments in the following manner: "We thank the God of Israel, the Father of all our Mercies, for life and health, for food and clothes, home and friends, wife and daughter, church and Bible, money and paper, the old flag and a clean army record, Christian parents and literary endowments, Danville and good neighbors, our united country, and the glorious Republican party. And, with a contrite and grateful heart, we frankly confess we hav not deserved, and do not deserve, a tithe of the blessings which hav been vouchsafed to us." It must be a source of gratification to the deity to know that his humble efforts to please are so fully appreciated by an Editor.

MEDICAL men hav for some time arrived at the conclusion that consumption is infectious. The matter has been taken up in a very practical way in the German army, in which the disease is stated to be very prevalent. All soldiers suffering from it are isolated, and, to prevent any possible infection, on no account are they to be allowed to associate with patients suffering from pneumonia or acute bronchitis, while special means are to be taken for the disinfection of the sputa in infectious cases.

R. J. CUMMINGS, of Conneaut, O., who has made a study of the disposition of the dead, is forming a stock company for the purpose of erecting a crematory similar to Dr. Lemoyne's at Washington, Pa. He says the cost of the crematory will be $5,000, and proposes for a $50 share to giv each stockholder the privilege of burning one body. The idea is not meeting with much success, but Mr. Cummings says he will build one himself in some town between Buffalo and Cleveland. This, together with Dr. Lovet's embalming process, which is located in Erie, givs western Pennsylvania great prominence in the matter of disposing of the dead.

A NEW YORK correspondent reports in a German paper an astounding discovery. He states that in the virgin forests of Sonora, a province of western Mexico, near Magdalena, a pyramid has been found, measuring 4,350 feet at its base, and rising to the hight of 750 feet. A carriage road winds about this enormous structure from base to summit. The face consists of granit blocks carefully cut and perfectly fitted together. Not far distant stands a hill which, we are told, is honeycombed with cells of various sizes, all cut out of the solid rock. They are without windows, several are on the same level, and the walls are adorned with fantastic shapes and symbols.

A. P. MOORE, who owns Santa Rosa Island, near the California coast, has 80,000 sheep, from which he clipped, in June last, 415,740 pounds of wool. He sold this for $212,349.80, and realized a clear profit of $80,000. Four men are employed regularly the year round to keep the ranch in order and to look after the sheep, and during shearing time fifty or more shearers are employed. These men get forty or fifty days' work, and the average number of sheep sheared a day is about ninety, for which five cents a clip is paid, $4.50 a day being made by each man. Mr. Moore, who bought the property from his brother's widow for $600,000, has leased it to his brother Lawrence for $140,000 a year, and will travel for his health.

THE London correspondent of the Times forwards a second letter which was written in blood by a Nihilist confined in the Troubletskoi Bastion at St. Petersburg. It describes the harrowing treatment received by the prisoners, and says their food is often mouldy and sometimes putrid, that dysentery and scurvy are prevalent, and that the doctor is afraid to touch the patients. Few medicins are prescribed, and when ordered they are generally countermanded. The prisoners rot away and exhale the odors of dead bodies before life is extinct. The number of those who go mad in consequence of their sufferings is daily increasing. Madmen are strapped down and whipped with the knout by the keepers. Fierce yells resound throughout the night. Many prisoners hav committed suicide. It is said that one woman was outraged and then poisoned, but no inquiries into the affair were instituted by the authorities. Rats are the worst enemies of the prisoners. A woman with a babe was obliged to be constantly on the watch and to fight night and day to prevent the rats from devouring her child. The use of combs and soap is forbidden. The jailers are only kind to those having money. Prisoners who refuse to reply to questions are tortured, and cases of violation of women are frequent. The writer especially appeals to the civilized world in behalf of the women in the prison, whose situation, he says, is far worse than the men's.

THE suit of Bridget Cronin against the Rev. Father Florence McCarthy, pastor of St. Cecilia's church, Williamsburgh, to recover $10,000 for attempted assault, was set down for trial in the Supreme Court, Brooklyn, last Wednesday afternoon. Neither the defendant nor any of his witnesses was in attendance, and Justice Brown, after hearing the testimony of the plaintiff, directed the jury to giv a verdict for the amount claimed. Miss Cronin made a statement of the occurrences on which she based her suit. She said she was 18 years old, and had known Father McCarthy for ten years. He is pastor of the Roman Catholic church of St. Cecilia, on Humboldt street. On January 12th she went to Father McCarthy's house, accompanied by a little boy. She rang at the basement door, and a girl opened it. Miss Cronin asked for Father McCarthy, and the girl went up-stairs. Father McCarthy came to the top of the stairs and called down to her to come up. She was going to take the boy with her, but Father McCarthy said, "Leave him down there." She went up-stairs and entered the parlor, followed by Father McCarthy, who closed the door. She sat down on a sofa, and he sat on a chair in front of her. She spoke to him about musical vespers which she was arranging, and asked whether the tickets were ready. He said they were not, and then asked her to go into a small room adjoining and pull down the shade. She refused to do so. She then got up to leave the house, when he seized her. She then left the house. Her feelings were greatly hurt, and she was much troubled for some time. She told her parents and others of the assault, and finally made known the facts to Bishop Loughlin. McCarthy is still pastor of the church.

FEW persons know that there is a law in Pennsylvania punishing profanity with a fine, and that one-half of the fine goes to the person making the charge. But such is the fact, and Charles Holst, a tight-fisted citizen of Philadelphia, remembered it to his own profit and the discomfiture of an honest neighbor, Charles Gibbs by name and a shoemaker by profession. Gibbs had a bill of $7.60 against Holst for shoes made and mended. Gibbs is much inclined to profanity, and interlards his conversation with words that do not look well in print. Gibbs is excitable. Holst is cool as a cucumber, Gibbs dunned Holst, who replied that the shoes were good for nothing and refused to pay. Gibbs got mad and began to swear. Holst out with his pencil and marked down every oath as it was uttered, on the back of a card. Whenever Gibbs showed any signs of stopping Holst provoked him to continue his profanity, until twenty-four oaths were marked on the score. Then he hied him to the nearest magistrate and directed his honor's attention to this law, "If any person of the age of sixteen years or upward shall profanely curse or swear by the name of God, Jesus Christ, or of the Holy Ghost, he shall forfeit or pay the sum of sixty-seven cents for every such profane curse or oath," and then to the law giving the informer half of the fine. A warrant was issued, Gibbs was arrested; Holst testified to the number of oaths, and the fines, amounting to $16.08, were collected, one-half of which, $8.04, was paid to Holst, the informant, who then paid the shoemaker $7.60 of his own money and had forty-four cents left, with which he "set 'em up" for the constable in the nearest beer saloon. Holst ought to apply for a position under the Law and Order Society. He possesses rare qualities for an informer, which that association might utilize.

THE people of Switzerland hav elected a Liberal president and a Radical vice-president.

IT is reported that Chester A. Arthur will enter for the presidential race next fall if his own state, New York, will stand by him.

MONSIGNOR SAVARESE, until recently the pope's domestic prelate, has left the Catholic church and joined the church of England.

FREEMAN, the Pocasset Abraham, has been adjudged insane and placed in an asylum. It is lucky for him that the murder was a religious one.

A BELGIAN engineer was arrested at Nice, Italy, last week on suspicion of having attempted to murder M. deLesseps by an infernal machine.

A BILL is to be introduced into Congress authorizing the postmaster-general to construct and operate three lines of telegraph for postal purposes.

THE Annisquam cotton mill at Rockport, Mass., was burnt last Sunday. The loss is estimated at $400,000, and 235 operators are thrown out of employment.

A BLACK bear carried off a child sixteen months old from a farmhouse in the township of Cicero, Wis., last Saturday. At last accounts all search for the missing child was without success.

A GREAT force of the hill tribes of Egypt attacked 700 Egyptians on the 5th inst., and annihilated them, capturing the artillery. The regular troops consisted of 500 blacks and 200 Bashi-Bazouks, and were considered the flower of the army!

THE Rev. Daniel O'Mahony, a Catholic priest, was found wandering in the streets of this city last Sunday night. Examination showed that he was insane. He is from County Cork, Ireland, and his incoherent ravings indicate that he believes himself at his nativ place.

D. W. YOUNG, a Universalist Sunday-school superintendent, and L. Kennan, a Presbyterian Sunday-school superintendent, both of Newark, O., quarreled on a public square. Young called Kennan a liar. Kennan knocked Young down, but Young arose and in two handsome rounds did Kennan up artistically, stretching him on the pavement. Both men stand high in the community.

NEW YORK'S new district attorney, Mr. Peckham, has decided that liquor licenses are rendered void by the conviction of a saloon-keeper who breaks the Sunday law. The result was that last Sunday a few hundred rum shops were closed, and many thousand used the most strenuous endeavors to keep open and appear closed. On the whole, not much difficulty was experienced by tipplers in getting a drink.

HENRY E. SHARPE, who has been before the public as the founder of some sort of a colony out in Iowa, was in the courts of this city, last week, for stealing his own child from his wife. The court returned the child to its mother. The trouble arose over the fact that Mrs. Sharpe, who charges that Sharpe married her for her money, refused to giv him half her property. The stealing of the child was a stroke of diplomacy to bring her to terms, but failed to take effect.

THE Rev. J. O. Bache, of this city, was garroted and robbed on the street on the night of the evening of the 6th. About $1,000 in money and jewelry was taken from his person. He thinks his assailants were men who had previously attempted to extort money from him by blackmail. The name of the Rev. Mr. Tyng, Jr., together with letters that hav passed between the latter clergyman and a woman not his wife, is unpleasantly mixed up in the affair. The story of the Rev. Mr. Bache is doubted by some.

Philosophical.

The Problem of the Universe and Its Scientific Solution, with some Criticisms of Universology.—Concluded.

BY SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

It is said by some that, if we come down to this purely materialistic basis for knowledge, there will be no basis for morality. Morality is supposed to be born of mind, and unless mind is immortal the ethical obligation must vanish.

This is not so! Morality is founded upon relation, and so long as the relation exists, so long does morality exist. When we see the relation, then we see the right of it; and when the relation vanishes, the perception of right disappears, for it is no longer necessary. If, however, the relation is again established, then again does the right manifest itself. Morality is ever variable for the reason that the relations of human life are eternally transforming themselves, and the right therefore becomes a very protean affair. But each relation has its right, and the moment the mind comes into those relations, it perceives the right. Morality is fixed only on the basis of fixed relations; keep the relation always the same, and moral action is always the same; but new relations bring new duties.

To make morality a fixed thing is one of the greatest tyrannies. To limit morality is worse even than to limit thought. The ethical nature must be free, even as the intellectual nature must be free. Unless we can morally accommodate ourselves to all the changing circumstances of human life we are the most pitiable of slaves. But while morality, the highest form of human life, is thus forever reappearing in sublimer aspects, it cannot die, for it is a part of human nature, woven into our being by the very necessities of our sociable organization. As we can not live alone, even so one cannot be immoral. As we must work together, even so we must be devoted to the right. Self-interest points to the grandest generosity. Utilitarians' morals are the highest conceivable; for one can have no nobler motive to an action than its usefulness. It is impossible to find a better reason. Since there will always be usefulness, there will, as a matter of course, always be morality; and that which will conduce to morality is knowledge. Religion never made men moral. It is knowledge always that has done this; for not until we recognize relations can we recognize the duty that springs from them. Religion may be an impulse, but science is the guiding power evermore. To make the basis of knowledge material, is not to destroy morality, but to give it a more vivid existence, for we shall then have a more vivid perception of relation. There is no such thing as abstract morality. An infinite being could not be a moral being from the very fact that he could not come into relation with other beings. His infinitude would destroy his morality. The foundation of all morality is the sense of otherness and the obligation that hence arises. We are not moral to ourselves. To take care of ourselves is not morality, it is simply wisdom. To care for others is both wisdom and morality. The highest form of morality is fraternity, and its fundamental impulse springs from our social nature. The scientific explanation of the universe, instead of diminishing the moral sense, will make it more powerful, for science, as I have said before, is not individual, but social and universal.

Furthermore, it should be thoroughly understood that science is by no means committed to the doctrine of fate. Fate is a purely metaphysical conception, it is not scientific. Science does not declare that a thing must be, only that it will be. It deals with certainties, but not with necessity. It affirms the invariability of law; but along with that it affirms the immense changeability of phenomena, of the outcome of the law. The law is ever producing new results, such as never existed before. I do not believe in cycles. I do not believe that the world is ever going round and round and always returning to the same point. The world proceeds onward. There is no backward movement, and no recurrences. The song of the poet is "ever old, ever new." The law in its substance—is ever old; that cannot be altered; from eternity to eternity it is the same; but the fruit of that law is ever new; some fresh glory is forever flashing forth. Each spring-time and each summer has a joy and a wonder all its own. It is not a repetition. Because this earth was, long ago, a molten flame, it does not follow that it ever will be again. The nebular hypothesis is simply an hypothesis, and we cannot positively affirm what was the condition of the earth a million years ago. We can only guess; but even if we guess right, and it was a mass of fire, this is no demonstration that in the hereafter it will come back to that original state. We know nothing about this! The doctrine of cycles is a metaphysical doctrine, not a scientific. The reason of science is founded upon experience, and we can only know the future by actual experience. We can make no assumptions concerning it. New conditions make new results, and the conditions of this universe are ever changing, and therefore the phenomena of one age will not recur. The future is immeasureable, both in quantity and quality. There is room, therefore, for boundless hope and boundless imagination. We can picture anything, and it all lies within the realm of possibility. Our grandest vision may become a reality. This universe is not an iron universe. It is not a fixity—a foreordained affair. Its existence is necessary, I grant, but not the endless forms of its manifestation. This is a flowing universe. It is ever in motion. It is matter, and it is force; unchangeable in essence—never greater, never less—but million-fold in phenomenal procedure. And experience teaches that in this phenomenal procedure the mind of man can change conditions, give new antecedents, and hence new consequences. Given the same antecedents, and the same consequences will follow. To this law all mental power is obedient; but the antecendents can be rearranged, and from rearrangement new results will appear more brilliant and more beautiful. To do this is in the power of man. If we fly in the face of nature, she is our enemy indeed, and builds an iron wall about us; but if we bend to the dictates of her eternal order, then that order becomes a mobile and wonderful force. It flashes into the steamship, the palace car, the electric flame, the sounding wave, and the earth becomes a beneficent mother and we revel in her riches, and in the sweat of our face we win sovereignty even of the skies.

Science is not an iron master, but a benignant teacher, a friend and guide to new and entrancing joys. She does not declare that the past must be the measure of the future. Heirs we are of the past, and to a certain extent we must obey the channels it has made; but the life of man is still spontaneous, and that which throbbed in the first bit of protoplasm still sends its heaving tides, and the achievements of the past are simply an index of the future, not the law. The marvelous power of protoplasm, of which man is but a form, is reaction against environment. This is the origin of life—life is reaction, and reaction is a re-creation. Out of the simple and original impulse of reaction against environment have come the achievements of our wondrous humanity. More complex and more wonderful still grow these reactions, recreating new environments; hence new reaction, fresh glories, more majestic and more beautiful pathways for human endeavor. Under the reign of law we pass into eternally new conditions, into brighter surroundings, into vaster capacities, into more splendid activities, and the eye of the poet can not pierce to all the wonder that will be. The heart of the prophet cannot sound the immeasurable future. The breathing canvass, the white marble, cannot picture the onward life of man. Music swelling like an ocean bursting forth with infinite melodies cannot catch even in its grandest symphonies the sweep of the far wandering stream of humanity.

Wonderful, magnificent, are the possibilities of science, and no promise of theology, no dream of metaphysics, can equal the actual achievement of this Christ of humanity.

Let it be understood, also, that science, the god, the Christ, this divine providence of man, bears no whit of authority. It has no edicts. It imposes no law by mere stress of custom or vote. No one man, and no body of men, can represent science. It has no councils, and no pope, and no decrees. I reject any "authorities" of science as much as I do the authorities of the church. Science needs no legislation, no ballot, and no "consensus of the competent." Science is infinitely patient. It constantly appeals to the reason of every man. It is not afraid of contradiction. It is not the slave of consistency. It does not regard consistency as a jewel if it stands in the way of larger vision. It does not command any belief. It presents its demonstration, and lets the mind work freely to its conclusion. No man is obliged to accept. Truth is freely assimilated. Most truly is science the servant of humanity. It is a glorious rebel indeed. It will admit no authority, but having destroyed all other authority it will not insist upon its own. It wants no parliament—only the open mind. It manifests the truth, and then lets the truth take care of itself, as it is well able to when it has a fair field. Science is liberty. It demands liberty, and it gives liberty. It rejects authority, and it will not ultimate in any authority whatsoever, not even in the authority of truth, only in the influence and persuasion of truth in the untrammeled mind of every man.

I insist upon this scientific solution of the universe, because I believe its acceptance absolutely necessary to human progress. In science only can the world find happiness and freedom. Theology and metaphysics both are the strongholds of tyranny. When tyrants can no longer appeal to the god of theology, they will find refuge in the entities of metaphysics. Transcendentalism, with its vague idealism, still doth hedge the king about with divinity, as witness Carlyle, one of the most thorough-going of idealists, and one of the most thorough-going believers in despotism. Science alone can strip despots of their factitious authority, destroy the halo about them, and reveal the common clay of which they are composed; and while it thus reveals the clay of the king, it declares the value, the gold of our simple and permanent humanity.

This essay is the result of years of mental conflict. I have tried both theology and metaphysics, and they have turned to dust and ashes. They have given me no solution of the universe, and hence no joy and no comfort. They are Dead Sea apples; they glisten only with poisonous enchantment; they lure, but they lure to death—to death of hope, and death of human progress. Only without God is there liberty in the world. As Bakounine nobly says, "If there were a God, it would be necessary to abolish him." Indeed it would, for an infinite God is an infinite despot. In the very nature of things it is so. An infinitely good God would still be a tyrant, and the foe of human freedom. In the hands of such a God we would be machinery only. The liberty of man demands the dethronement of deity. God or goodness is only finite, and its highest splendor is manifest in the eternal struggles of humanity.

Hence the necessity of this discussion. It is not futile. To determine the true solution of the universe is to bring us to the best practical work. We are not ready for our highest activity until, by the action of our reason, we have put theology and metaphysics aside as absolutely worthless. So long as the vague mists and clouds infest our intellectual horizon, so long shall we make bitter mistakes in regard to every-day affairs, and waste much of our vitality in useless effort. In the place of theology and metaphysics we must put art and poetry. Art and poetry only can represent, in concrete form, the infinite aspirations of the human soul. Here only can the true and noble ideals find valid utterance. Theology and metaphysics lead only to a barren wilderness, while art and poetry do forever feed the fountains of human life, and forever illuminate with glowing pictures, the background of the unknowable infinite.

In adopting science we do not destroy idealism, for science is eminently ideal, forward-looking, and progressive. It creates vast enthusiasms, wonderful impulses. Look at its glorious revealings, millions of stars, infinite palaces of light and glory in the measureless realms of night; and in the bosom of the flower, in the hard rock, in the dancing foam of the sea, in the weed that tosses on the shore, in the passing breeze, in the bending grass, what wondrous wealth of life is ever flaming to our eyes; and so science, Memnon-like, is bursting forth with music on our way, as eternally new dawns flash upon its marble lips. Ah, science may seem cold to some, but she throbs with life; and when once the world is given wholly to her guidance, and adopts the severe limits of her methods and knowledge, then will be heard the sweetest songs; then will be enjoyed the most noble fruits.

Is the State of Michigan a Christian State?

I hav just noticed the following remark in a sample paper sent me: "The acting president of the Michigan University, in his annual report to the regents of that institution, says: 'The state of Michigan is a Christian state, and her institutions are founded and governed on Christian principles. Christianity, therefore, is not only tolerated in the University—not merely not proscribed—but is unhesitatingly honored and cherished. Our dependence is upon God—is acknowledged in the invocation of his blessing on the meetings of the regents, and in the public exercises of prayers in the chapel through the year.'"

Now, Mr. Editor, I hav been a resident of Michigan and a taxpayer in this state for nearly forty years, and this is certainly news to me—that this is a Christian state, founded and governed on Christian principles. I had always supposed that it was a state whose organic law was founded on the United States preamble and Constitution, and that it was the intention of all its loyal citizens that its laws should be administered and carried out on that line. I know the child of the mother church, the evangelical Bible Christians, wanted to steal our State University at Ann Arbor, as they hav stolen Girard College in Philadelphia, but I had not thought of its trying to steal the whole state. The honorable gentleman says their dependence on God is acknowledged in the invocation of his blessing on the meetings of the regents, and in the public exercises of prayers in the chapel, etc.; and this he takes as proof that the university is a Christian institution.

Mr. Editor, this brings to my mind a circumstance that took place in my domestic concerns a number of years ago. My wife being from home, the housekeeper in her absence let the cockroaches get possession of the victual cupboard, and when my wife got home and found the situation of things, she went to work and ordered them to leave at once; but they claimed the right of possession to the victual cupboard, on the ground of a peaceable possession so long. Now, the claim of these cockroaches to this cupboard was just about as good as that of the Christian church to the State University at Ann Arbor, or that of the mother church to the United States government, which the pope and his cardinals are now considering at their council in Rome.

One thing, Mr. Editor, looks to me pretty certain —that if the lovers of American institutions do not wake up to the importance of keeping this Bible superstition and Catholic idolatry out of our public schools and colleges, while we hav this right in our own hands, we may expect trouble, just such as they hav had in the eastern hemisphere. Just to the extent that the rising generation is educated on a line with the principles of the preamble and Constitution of our country, which is purely secular, will they be true Americans.

Stephen Girard said in his will (which the Christian church has so shamefully disregarded): "Let them be taught the purest principles of morality, so that on their entrance into activ life they may, from inclination and habit, evince benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, and a love of truth and sobriety and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer." But this good counsel and direction in his will has all been disregarded by the Christians, and they now hav a Christian church erected on the grounds, with regular Christian services in it. During the Centennial I was there at their Christian mummery. The thought struck me then that if it had been vice versa—if it had been some pious Christian that had left a bequest of three millions of dollars, for a purely Christian college, and the Infidels (as they call them) had stolen it and turned it into a free college, what a rumpus we would hav heard about it. I say just to the extent that the rising generation is educated on a line with the principles of the Constitution of the United States, there will be a good chance for its permanency; and just to the extent that we allow these old superstitions of a bygone age (which hav been such a fruitful source of the fighting and slaughter among people) to mixed up in our public schools and colleges, we may expect they will breed trouble and eventually sap the foundations of our free government. The Workingwomen of New York City.

From John Swinton's Paper.

Every night of this wintry season, under the darkness of 6 o'clock, you can see trudging through the streets of New York, to their boarding-houses or other quarters, thousands and tens of thousands of young workingwomen. They hav been toiling from early daylight at some one or other of the hundred industries through which they find scanty means of livelihood. They are now in the horse-cars and elevated trains; they crowd their way along Nassau street and City Hall park; they swarm through the Bowery; they march in long procession up Second and Third avenues, Sixth and Eighth avenues, and other lines of busy travel and traffic on the east and west sides of the island. They hav been variously employed through the day as:

Dressmakers,	Seamstresses,
Paper-box makers,	Lace workers,
Artificial-flower hands,	Tailoresses,
Silk embroiderers,	Collar makers,
Crochet workers,	Necktie makers,
Kid-glove makers,	Paper-bag makers,
Shoe fitters,	Cigaret rollers,
Photograph colorers,	Bead workers,
Fringe makers,	Tobacco strippers,
Feather workers,	Suspender makers,
Laundresses,	Upholsterers,
Milliners,	Bookfolders,
Base-ball hands,	Cloak makers,
Candy packers,	Yarn spoolers,
Type writers,	Hat finishers,
Cashiers,	Fur sewers,
Toy makers,	Flag makers,
Umbrella makers,	Pocketbook hands,
Straw sewers,	Fruit canners,
Hair workers,	Errand girls,
China painters,	Bookstitchers,
Piano-action makers,	Governesses,
Nurses,	Canvassers,
Housekeepers,	Cash girls,
Corset makers,	Perfumery makers,
Costumers,	Labelers,
Gold-leaf workers,	Hoopskirt makers, or in scores of other industries where their labor can be made available.

They turn out an army one hundred thousand strong, for that is their number as near as can be ascertained from the imperfect statistics that hav been compiled. No accurate census has ever been made of these workingwomen, but the Protectiv Union, which keeps a free registry of those seeking work through its agency, has thirty thousand names on its books, and as many more are on the rolls of the Women's Christian Association and other organizations. At least as many more, it is estimated by those best informed, are seeking employment and livelihood through their own individual efforts, so that 100,000 is likely to be below, rather than above, the actual number of women bread-winners in this city.

These working women who are on their way home in the early darkness, left their homes (if they have any) or lodging-places, some of them at six o'clock in the morning, and few of them as late as seven. From seven or eight o'clock till six they have bent over machines of one kind or another, or sat on hard-backed chairs, or stood on aching feet.

Ten hours a day is a short average for the time employed. You will see thousands more of these women coming from shops and stores at seven, eight, nine, ten, eleven o'clock at night, who have been at their tasks from seven in the morning. Some of the petty shop keepers on the East side drive their saleswomen with a brutality that makes black slavery at its worst seem humane.

What are the wages paid in the various trades and industries to these women, young and old?

There, again, we find the answer hard to obtain. There are no trades unions or societies, no market rates of wages. Much of the work is piece-work—so much a dozen or gross or what not—and the pay depends on the skill and swiftness of the worker. Twenty dollars a week is the very highest sum paid to any of the women of whom the Workingwomen's Protective Union has a record; but of course this class is so small as to be hardly worth counting. Those wages are earned by forewomen in dress-making, cloak-making, or fur-trimming shops. Some few young women of good common school education and generally cleverness earn $10 to $15 a week on type writers, but these also are exceptions.

The minimum of wages it would be hard to strike. Small girls who assist older workers in the various trades get as low as a dollar a week, and two to four dollars a week each is all that thousands of girls can earn in factories and stores. Girls who earn six or seven dollars a week are objects of envy to thousands of their less fortunate sisters.

The average earnings of the one hundred thousand working women of the great metropolis are about four dollars and fifty cents a week! The interest for three months on that lesser part of Vanderbilt's fortune that is invested in government bonds would more than pay the whole week's wages of all these hundred thousand workers.

Where and how do they liv? In all sorts of quarters, in every place, and under every condition that their hard circumstances warrant. In attics and basements about Battery park; in East Side and West Side tenements; in lodging-houses kept by landladies as merciless and grasping as employers; with widowed mothers, or married sisters, or generous brothers, in humble homes in Yorkville and Harlem; at the ends of almost interminable car routes away out in Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Hoboken. Where lodgings are hardest and cheapest you will find the larger part of the great army quartered, striving almost hopelessly to exist on the scant wages earned by wearisome hours of hard toil.

Follow any of these passing girls to their homes. This one, just released from an uptown store, leads us a long chase to the second floor of a Jersey City cottage, where, with her mother and sister, she has lodgings. Her $5 a week—or what is left after paying the inevitable ferriage and car-fares—are the main support of the family. The dollar or two more that the mother and sister earn making pantaloons, at ten or twelve cents a pair, or shirts at four cents apiece, make up the sum total of the family income. They make their own clothing, and, with every economical possibility that ingenuity can devise, the end of each week finds them in exactly the same condition as the preceding week, with their noses at the grinding-stone of necessity, and not a penny put by for a rainy day.

There go three girls from a downtown bookbindery. Like thousands of their sisters, they hav no homes to go to. They board an East Broadway car, which takes them to a decayed East Side street, where they hav two little dismal connecting back-rooms, or perhaps mere lairs, in the attic. In one room are two beds, in the other a small cook stove. The girls rent the quarters furnished, and do their own work; rise at five or six in the morning to get their own breakfasts, and then cook their dinners after they return from work at night. The three together earn $13 a week, and by this mode of life contrive to get enough to eat and keep cheaply clad.

There goes a young woman with a little reticule under her arm. She looks as though she might be a school-mistress on her way somewhere, but she is a weary saleswoman in a Grand street store. She livs in a young women's home in a West Side street. She walks the entire distance, both ways, to save car fares. She needs to do that, for out of her $6 a week she pays $5 for the hall-bedroom and board in the home. She likes to be quiet, and pays a dollar a week extra for room by herself. She dresses on twenty dollars a year, with an extra ten sent to her by her brother in Boston.

At best a working-woman must pay $3 a week for lodging in a cheap boarding-house, and the fare at that price is thin and scant. In the dearer places the average price of board is $4 to $5 a week. The various homes and lodging-houses built by associations, which furnish board at cost, hav not been able to go below these figures. At Stewart's Hotel for women it was found that five dollars per week would not pay the cost of keeping each person there.

With wages for women in this city averaging $4.50 per week, and board at the same figures, what solution do you find for the problem of women's drudgery and misery?

What becomes of the workingwomen? Go up to the rooms of the Protectiv Union and see. Here is an American woman upon whose white head the storms of seventy winters hav beaten? She was a dressmaker once, but her fingers long ago lost their cunning. She has come now to borrow a dollar to buy bread until she can realize a vain hope of earning something.

Here is a note from a young saleswoman in a fashionable store. She is dying of consumption, contracted by standing in the cold draft of an ever-swinging door, and is threatened with ejection from her quarters because she is in arrears for rent.

That weeping woman sitting there is the mother of a pretty but wayward girl, whose downfall may be traced to late hours and life of a miscellaneous character. The mother wants to reclaim her child.

Here comes a pale-faced young woman to ask the Union to assist her in recovering a few dollars from her late hard-fisted employer, who discharged her because she did not perform her allotted task in time. Would you believe it! The Union has actually prosecuted rascally employers in more than eight thousand cases, and recovered money out of which they were trying to defraud poor girls! They even cheat down to as small a sum as fifty cents, and it is to the credit of this plucky society that it has dragged scoundrels into court for that small sum and made them pay.

Workingmen hav now and then a chance to rise, even under our present shameful condition of society; but for workingwomen there is no chance. "There are no palaces, no great houses, no cottages even," says a recent writer, "which tell the workingwomen that one of her class and opportunity has ever risen above want to competency. For her there is only the possibility and no more, of an unfurnished and scant lodging and scant clothing to-day, the same to-morrow, no better than it was yesterday.

The wreck of life, the ruin of mind, and the crushing of hope, forever going on, year after year, among the hundred thousand workingwomen of this city, who can tell?

From the New York Graphic.

John Swinton's Paper says the workingwomen of this city earn on an average $4.50 per week. A more careful investigation will prove that the average wages of workingwomen in New York does not exceed $3.40 per week. It will also show that the employment is by no means continuous. "Outcast" New York receives many accessions annually from among the women workers. Is it any wonder?

The Secular Benevolent Association.

I hav just read with much interest two articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, one by Fred. Shepard, and the other a review of the constitution of the Supreme Secular Benevolent Association, both of which seem to be in the right direction.

To my mind such a society would meet a long-felt need among our people; not only in its relation to dollars and cents provided against a day of need, but would furnish a bond of cohesion to draw and hold our people together in a common cause for a worthy object. Church people find such cohesion in dogmatic superstitions, but Liberals and Infidels, having not the fear of God, devil, or hell before their eyes, running on under the bare poles of human reason, need such a society for its cohesiv qualities. For, say what we will about magnanimity and unselfish acts, self-interest is the mainspring of all human action. Make it an individual self-interest to hold and attend meetings to advance the cause of secularism, and you hav hit the nail on the head. Who of all of the Liberals who belong to any of the secret societies now extant will not admit that every one of them, from Freemasonry down, is lugging along superstitions, and is helping to keep alive old sacred lies at the expense of truth and manhood?

Go ahead, good friends, and giv us a purely secular benefit society, with no holy Bible, and no religion, save the religion of humanity, in it. To poke crooked sticks down a straight man's throat is an uphill business; besides, it hurts some people. And that is just what is done when a Liberal man is made to lay his hands upon the Bible, as in Masonry, to confirm an obligation. Or, as in temperance orders, especially the Red Cross, to tote a man around the lodge and hav small doses of religion shot at him at every turn, and then to flop down on his knees and lay both hands upon a bloody red cross, that symbol of cruelty and blood—that symbol of aggressiv deviltry which has carried discord and sorrow in its path down through the ages, and, like a mildew, has blasted the peace and happiness of the family and state—is too much for Infidel endurance. Giv us secular benevolence, secular morality, and secular everything to the end of the chapter.

And now a word about the "Children's Corner," and I hav done. This new feature in our TRUTH SEEKER, the "Children's Corner," is far more important than many are apt to think, for the children are soon to take our places in life, and I am not in sympathy with such milk-and-water Infidels as permit their children to be gathered in to Christian Sunday-schools, and inoculated with the virus of this mental disease, which is liable to break out in them long after they hav passed beyond the old roof-tree of home influence and culture. I thank you, Brother Macdonald, for this most significant feature of your paper. And I almost envy any one who can write well for the comprehension of children and young people; a rich and rare gift to adapt one's self to the instruction of the young. And we trust that Miss Susan H. Wixon, possessing this noble gift in such high degree, will find many rich blessings in return for her kindly efforts. DR. J. L. YORK.

Errors Corrected.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of November 10th, page 707, is an article by Elmina, headed by an extract from a letter to her by "T. B. L.," commencing thus: "I received an appeal the other day from Mr. Hacker. I asked my father if he thought I had better send him a dollar," etc. Now, this looks as if I had made an appeal to him to giv me a dollar, when I hav done nothing like it. And as I do not like to be misrepresented, I must ask you to publish this article.

Near the last of August I had a lot of my rhymes printed, vindicating the character of God—if there is such a being—against the falsehoods contained in the Bible stories of the creation and the atonement, and exposing the absurdity of those stories. I sent out perhaps fifty copies of the rhymes free to different individuals, by way of advertising them, asking those to whom they were sent if they knew newsdealers who would like some of them to sell. This is all the appeal I hav made, or ever shall make, to anyone for help.

In the same article "T. B. L." censures Liberals for permitting us and other aged workers to suffer; and as I do not think it fair for my good friends to be misrepresented, I must ask for a little more space for them. I hav been trying for sixteen years to get a living on less than three acres of land—all that I was able to pay for—by raising grapes and berries for the city market; but the prices hav gone down so low, and I hav become so aged, that for several years past the fruits hav not paid more than the expense of cultivation, and that has made us poor; but it is not true, as "T. B. L." intimates, that Liberals hav left us without aid. If it had not been for the help that Infidels, Spiritualists, and others outside of the church, hav given us, our little home would hav been used up long since, and we should hav been forced to cut the thread of life to escape the horrors of a Christian pauper-house; for we never will become inmates of any institution where aged and virtuous people and innocent children are crowded into the same rooms with drunkards, thieves, and harlots—where we should hav no others to nurse us when sick, or to close our eyes in death; hav our starved bodies sold to medical colleges, and our skins to tanners, to be wrought into shoes for the pious Grundies to wear to church.

It is true that we hav not had all that was necessary for comfort, and hav sometimes known what it was to suffer; but it is equally true that the above classes hav saved our lives till the present time, by doing far more for us than we ever knew any church to do for any two of its aged members situated as we are.

Nearly thirty years ago, when publishing a paper in Maine, that state had large tracts of wild land. Without the aid of any paper but my own, I succeeded in getting a law to giv every landless man who would settle on and cultivate it, a farm lot at only fifty cents per acre, to be paid in labor on their own roads. A friend in Maine wrote me last year that there were scores of men owning good farms on land taken under that law. These are the men who ought to aid me. I consider them justly indebted to me. But when my friend told them that as I was now old and poor they ought to make me up a purse as a token of gratitude, they replied, "Oh, Hacker is an Infidel; is always running the church," when the fact is I hav never said a word about any church that was not strictly true.

Why should "T. B. L." be censuring those I hav never benefited for not helping me, while his own Christian brethren, who owe their very farms to my exertions, leave me to starve? He had better begin his work at home, and get the professed Christians right, before he turns his pop-gun on Infidels. He can dry up on that subject; or he can bring against Infidels all the crimes and shortcomings he can, and for each one of them, I pledge myself to bring ten against the ministers of his own patent modern gospel, which is no more like that of Christ than black is like white.

To all who hav so kindly aided us we are sincerely grateful, Yours, J. HACKER.

Berlin, N. J., Nov. 29, 1883.

THERE are stock-gambling clergymen in this city, says John Swinton's Paper, who get into scrapes even worse than that which lately brought the younger Rev. Dr. Tyng into the courts. I know of one who went to smash and the madhouse; and there are others who hav passed from the Stock Exchange through the "bucket shop" to the "curb stones." The Milwaukee papers hav accounts of an impending trial there over the estate of a deceased clergyman, amounting to $125,000, which, it appears, was amassed by "speculation;" and the Herald recently had a cable dispatch about the fact that the Rev. Dr. Begg, of Edinburgh, had left his family nearly half a million dollars, the "fruit of successful stock gambling." Stock-gambling clergymen preaching to sheep of the flock they hav skinned and to other stock-gambling wolves—you can, at your leisure, paint a picture of it.

Theism and Destiny.

MRS. HEDDON TO MR. WETTSTEIN.

You say that if I had never heard of the Jewish God, I would never hav thought of a "Soul of Nature." Has the poor Indian ever heard of the Jewish God or any other god? Yet he has conceived of a Great Spirit, and without a priest, or book, or a temple, he worships what he does not attempt to analyze. So with myself. Renouncing traditions, books, and creeds, I hav listened to the voices of nature, and they hav wispered of an infinit intelligence.

I do not try to comprehend the nature of deity, or his mode of existence, becauss I cannot comprehend my own existence, or any of my surroundings.

I perceive the universe, with all its laws, forces, and substances, is wholly unfathomable, and that the discoveries of science hav shed no light on the problem of causes; therefore I reject nothing because it is incomprehensible. Your objections to my "universal conscious soul" are founded upon the assumption that you know all there is of nature.

You say that "an infinit soul occupying all space would not leave room for anything else." Are you sure of this? Do you know that it is a recent discovery of science that two substances can occupy the same space at the same time? That certain forms of matter are vacuous to each other? What can be stranger than this? And yet it is a demonstrable fact. We thought once we knew something about matter, but later researches hav developed the fact that nobody knows anything about it absolutely; and Huxley declares that "within the vast unknown of matter, all things are possible."

Because we cannot conceive of an omnipresent mind, is no evidence of the non-existence of such a mind, for who can conceive of the eternity of matter, of the infinity of space, or of the nature of force?

You say that the "earnest thinkers will ever be asking what caused this conscious soul?" "Of what is it composed?"

I am amazed that you should suggest such a question.

What caused your primal atom? Of what is it composed? If matter can exist uncaused, why not spirit? The infinitesimal atom in which are concealed all the potential elements of the universe, ready to evolve into glorious worlds, is a proposition which is as "stunning" to contemplate as the self-existence and eternity of a spiritual entity.

Your remarks concerning the inability of deity to superintend the affairs of so many worlds, would be forcible if they had any application to the subject. You might as well ask how the sun can shine on all the planets at once, awakening life, motion, and fertility everywhere.

God does not superintend, create, design, govern, or control anything arbitrarily. He constitutes the spiritual and vital part of nature, without which nature would hav no existence.

But I hav already said more on this point than I intended, and wish now to call your attention to a promis you made in a previous letter that you would more fully explain your objections to a future life. Your readers are waiting with interest for your exposition of the grandeur and beauty of the annihilation scheme, and hope you will not forget it in your next.

Please tell us why you are so delighted with the discovery that you are a worm?—"only that and nothing more;" and also why you so inconsistently cling to this pleasing, anxious life, when all the wealth of the Vanderbilts would not buy your consent to take another instalment of it.

I take the ground that not man's reason alone, but his whole nature, should hav a voice in deciding this question. Our desires, emotions, and conceptions mean something (for nature never gravitates to naught), as well as our reasoning faculties, our love of existence, our affections, which are stronger than death; the patriotism which rushes on to death on the battle-field, are all out of proportion in their intensity if this life is all. "The love that will not sever at the portals of the tomb" is a prophecy of a reunion; and the dissatisfaction and vacuity which the most successful feel amid their earthly possessions can be explained only on the ground that the human soul is too vast in its nature to content itself with the toys which we call riches, rank, and fame. In the conditions of life which seem most favorable for happiness, all find within their souls an empty chamber, of which they knew nothing until the sigh of dissappointment arose amid the music of the feast. The man who has attained his utmost wish and completed his cherished plan, feels, in his heart, an infinit longing which scorns the best this world can giv, because his spirit is dimly conscious of nobler aims and its grander destiny. When we contemplate the wonders of nature and listen to its voices, we are thrilled with its beauties and harmonies, and we feel that there are yet deeper depths in our being than hav ever yet been sounded. Now, which is greater, the mind that can appreciate the music of an orchestra, or the instruments which giv forth the sounds?

I often wonder what the poor Materialist can enjoy of this life after eliminating all the poetry from nature, all the soul from music, all the meaning from beauty, all the grandeur from works of art, all the hope from love. I should think that this world would be to him but little better than a museum of automatic images, and the universe itself only an immense orrery. Materialism bears the same relation to Spiritualism as a marble statue does to a living man. MRS. E. HEDDON.

The Robbery of a Preacher.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: What a mysterious affair was that of the Rev. J. O. Bache yesterday! It must be a mistake. Here, according to the Sun of this morning, he was robbed of three hundred dollars in money, a two-hundred-and-fifty-dollar gold watch, a diamond—think of it!—pin worth three hundred and fifty dollars, and a diamond scarf-pin worth two hundred dollars. In this little account we can note several amusing circumstances. How did this lamb of Jesus—who of course sells all that he has and givs to the poor—happen to hav all this gold, diamonds, and money? Was not his struggling to release himself strange, when he worships a being who said that if a man took your coat the proper thing to do was to giv your cloak also? Truly the times are changed since, as Mr. Bennett said, Jesus "wandered listlessly about the fields," and led the life of an ignorant pauper here on earth. Is it not absurd for the Rev. Bache to pretend that he believes the bosh in which Jesus used to indulge about rich men entering the kingdom of heaven, and selling all and giving to the poor? I never heard of him before, but his exploit is certainly amusing to all those who admire candor and honesty.

48 Wall St., New York City. PHILIP G. PEABODY.

P.S.—I am glad to notice in the account that the robbers ran straight towards the cathedral after the robbery; no doubt they are good Catholics and can be found there every Sunday; let us hope that they hav confessed and been forgiven, so that their consciences are at rest; also that they will "take communion" at the earliest opportunity, so that if they should die before they indulge in other criminal acts, they will go straight to the "bosom of 'the savior.'" This is Christianity. P. G. P.

Good Suggestions.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: After my long silence, perhaps the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be of the opinion that in sending so many contributions of late—one following the other in so close proximity—I am "making up for lost time." I should not trouble you at the present time, were it not that I feel somewhat impelled to say a few words in favor of the Children's Corner. I think it is a grand idea to hav a certain portion of THE TRUTH SEEKER devoted weekly to the purpose specified in your paper of November 3d. It will be an offset to the goody-goody stories and articles in the papers which aim to bolster up priestcraft, and superstition, et hoc genus omne.

And I think that Susan H. Wixon is just the one to hav charge of the Children's Corner. I hav read the contributions, thus far, with much interest. They hav constantly been of a profitable, an interesting, and an instructiv character. Let as many of us, friends, as can find it convenient to do so, forward from time to time, stories, articles of interest and profit, and also poems, to the lady who conducts the children's department of our paper.

Each week that I receive THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am sensible of the fact that it grows better and better; and now that this new feature has been added to the paper, I feel very certain that it will continue to make still further advancement in the right direction.

Let us, then, giv Miss Wixon our hearty and undivided aid and support, and by so doing, render THE TRUTH SEEKER still more attractiv and worthy of the patronage of all Freethinkers.

So. Dartmouth, Mass. EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

How Does a Two-and-a-half-year-old Know What "Psyche Ceres" Means?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Our young lady-bug, two and one-half years old, a bundle of incarnate metaphysics, says, "I thought so before I was born;" again, "I was Psyche Ceres, soul and body, before mamma born me." Will philosophers crack this quick nut, this puzzling babyhood proclaiming pre-existence? Is mind made when mixed with matter, or was it previous being, "looking before and after?" Possibly memory extends back over the period of gestation; but what is the nature, intent, and destiny of persisting life, which has been the problem of ages? St. Paul, the Christite, speaks of a "spiritual body" surviving the great, irrational scare called death. Spenser, the English poet, says:

"Of the Soul the body form doth take,
For soul is form and doth the Body make."

Why will not Materialists, conspicuous in what they don't know, condescend to recognize facts? If T. Winter, for instance, would cease proclaiming the boundless extent of his ignorance, which is sufficently apparent; take off his hat to himself less, and discover that something is alive and kicking in Air as well as on Earth, less ink and paper would be wasted.

Some one (was it Sir Wm. Hamilton?) writes:

"On Earth there's nothing great but Man,
In man there's nothing great but Mind."

In the above opinion, as often in flesh-and-blood fact, "man" embraces woman. But what is mind, the invisible energy, the driving force in Nature? Your readers, of course, know that Psyche is the Greek for soul, while Ceres denotes animated, visible form, vegetable or animal body. The dogmatism of denial is quite as useless and repulsiv as the dogmatism of assertion. That mother of fools, the church; that father of knaves, the state; the latest device of learned idiots called science—what are these when weighed against Enterprise, informing, animating Life? Theologic or Atheist opinions are mere chaff; behind this wilderness of pronoun is called society; antedating dreary platitudes of philosophy, scholarism, and poetry lived the quick Word of Destiny, which was before God and will survive him.

E. H. HEYWOOD.

Princeton, Mass., Dec. 6, Y.L. 11.

Remsburg in Texas.

Wednesday, November 14th, I bade my wife and little ones good-bye, and took the train for the South, where I was to begin a five months' campaign, extending from Texas to Maine. The opening journey was a pleasant one, down through the fertil farms of Kansas and Missouri, and thence across the beautiful prairies of the Indian territory, where liv the feeble remnants of a once powerful race. The inhabitants of this territory are civilized, so far as Christianity and whisky are capable of civilizing them. It is strange that with all the gospel's boasted power the church is invariably compelled to resort to the use of some auxiliary agent in Christianizing a people. With the Chinese, the agent employed is opium; with the Sandwich Islanders a loathsome disease, and with the aborigines of this country, whisky.

Friday morning we cross the Red River, and in a short time enter Denison, the Gate City of the Lone Star state. Here B. C. Murray, one of the leading journalists of Texas, and a stanch Liberal, publishes his Sunday Gazetteer.

In the afternoon I went to Gainesville. The Northern Texas races were in progress, and Gainesville was filled from pit to dome. In the Laclede parlors, with a motley crowd of planters, jockeys, commercial men, and cowboys, I took my first night's sleep in Texas.

The next morning, before daylight, I took the stage for Montague. A lonely drive of forty miles was before us. My sole companion was a run-away stripling from Arkansas, who, armed with a Texas "life-preserver," a plug of tobacco, and two flasks of whisky, fancied that on the plains of Western Texas he would find fun, fortune, and fame.

In the Court House at Montague, I gave three lectures—"The Sabbath," "The Fathers of Our Republic," and "Thomas Paine." Some of the meek and lowly followers of Jesus had declared that any Infidel who attempted to speak in Montague would be mobbed. But their threats vanished in thin air, and the first course of Freethought lectures ever given in this part of Texas was listened to with the profoundest attention and respect.

The Liberals here are few in numbers, but courageous. Years ago that old veteran, George W. Carpenter, in the face of bitter persecution raised the standard of Freethought in Montague, and proposes while he livs to keep it waving.

Leaving Montague, I went to Bowie, where I took the train for Fort Worth. At a frontier town my friend, Capt. Seaton, of Atchison, boarded the train. Ex-Senator Gillespie, now of Fort Worth, but formerly of Kansas, had learned of our presence in the state, and requested us to visit him. We passed the evening with him—an enjoyable one—reviewing the days of "Auld Lang Syne," when as candidates for political honors we traversed the rural districts of Kansas together.

Tuesday night I spoke in Dallas to a fine audience. Dallas contains a goodly number of Liberals. Here John R. Spencer, aided by his faithful wife, prints and publishes the Agnostic, one of the ablest and brightest of our papers. Year after year, through storm and sunshine, hav this devoted pair ceaselessly labored for the cause. Do the Liberals of the South appreciate and reward their unselfish labors as they ought?

John Jackson, Allen Johnson, Dr. McKay, W. H. Johnson, and John Stone are also energetic workers here. It is hardly to be supposed that a Northern man, a Republican and an Infidel, would be popular in the South. Yet Mr. Stone, uniting in himself all these elements of political weakness, was three years ago elected mayor of one of the largest cities of Texas.

Last September, Henry Shanks, while on his way from church, where he had been seeking religion at a Methodist mourner's bench, stabbed and killed Henry Weimer, a German, for declaring that there was no God. Shanks was tried during my stay in Dallas, and a Christian jury brought in a verdict of "not guilty." The verdict was a surprise, for the murder was a most brutal one. What were the reasons for acquitting him I did not learn. The jury probably believed that God killed Weimer in self-defense, and that Shanks was merely the instrument with which he did it.

From Dallas I went to Norse, a Norwegian settlement in Central Texas. On my way I stopped at Fort Worth again, where I had a pleasant visit with that brilliant Liberal writer, Col. Peterson, the story of whose eventful life may be found in the "World's Sages."

At Norse we had three splendid meetings. There are many earnest Liberals here, among them Messrs. Olson, Canuteson, Johnson, and Montgomery; E. A. Rolen, and his venerable mother, who in appearance as well as in her devotion to the cause of Freethought, so forcibly reminds me of Amy Post; and last, but not least, that enthusiastic young worker who managed the meeting, T. Theodore Colwick.

My next move was to Bell county, a name familiar to nearly every Liberal in the land. It was here that Dr. L. J. Russell, one of the worthiest and most respected citizens of Texas, was taken from his home at night six years ago, and brutally whipped. The next morning, at the place where the outrage occurred, was found posted the following notice:

BELL CO. TEXAS.
NOTICE.

This is to certify that the Rev. Dr. Russel was cawled on Saturday knight the 6th of Oct. 1877 to visit a moovers wife that was camped at this place. And on the Drs arrival to this place 3 other men walked up and captured him and hit him 100 lashes with a leather strop and let him loose on the condishions that he would not lecture nor debate on infidelity in this county any more. Now a word to Munley, Posy and Marshal in fact all of the leading men of the infidel club if any of you take his place we will burn you out of house and home and hang you untill you are ded. If any man in this country is done any injury on account of what nas been done we wil burn you all out. We 4 have got 50 men to back us. Gents we mean business. Infidelity has got to stop in this county.

Dr. Russell had vanquished in debate numerous champions of orthodoxy, and the lash was expected to accomplish what logic failed to do. But Infidelity didn't "stop." To-day Bell county is one of the strongholds of Freethought. I spoke three times in the Opera House at Temple to large and enthusiastic audiences. Many had come from neighboring towns, some fifty miles away. Dr. Russell was present and presided.

Among the many intelligent Freethinkers whom I met here, I must not omit to name J. B. Nunneley, one of the Liberal pioneers of Texas. Mr. Nunneley is one of the prominent business men of Temple, and was the first Liberal to invite me to visit Texas.

On Monday evening I addressed a large and cultured audience at Waco. Waco is the home of J. D. Shaw, one of the remarkable men of our time. Mr. Shaw was until recently a clergyman in the Methodist church. Though scarcely forty years of age, he was brought forward by his friends for the post of bishop, and had he remained in the church, would hav been elected to this office at no distant day. He received a handsome salary, enjoyed a high position socially, had a powerful church to uphold him—everything that a clergyman's heart could desire. But he became convinced that Christianity was false, and with the brave resolve that he would die rather than liv a hypocrit, he gave up all save his honor, and espoused the cause of mental liberty. Entertaining Theistic notions at first, he has gradually outgrown them, and is now an Agnostic. He is a forcible writer, and is said to be one of the most eloquent and persuasiv speakers in the South. He is a man of stainless character, and universally respected. Many of the best people of Waco hav rallied around him and are building a handsome hall for him to lecture in. His Independent Pulpit, at the tenth number, had reached a circulation of nearly two thousand.

Waco was the last appointment in Texas that I could fill. They urged me to remain; calls came from every quarter of the state, but the only answer I could giv was a promis to come some future day.

Texas is an empire in extent. From Texarkana on the east, to El Paso on the west, the iron tape-line of the Texas Pacific measures off eight hundred and seventy miles. Its population is heterogeneous in character. Within its borders may be found representativs of every European race, nativ Southerners and Yankees, the negro and the Indian, Mexican and Mongolian, pauper and millionaire, the man of business and the "man of leisure," the modest schoolma'am and the festiv cowboy, ignorant bigots who would gladly hang or burn their neighbors for opinion's sake, and thousands of men and women as intelligent, as refined, and as Liberal as the world contains. Upon the whole, I like the state—its varied landscapes, its delightful climate, and, above all, its many brave and earnest Liberals whom I met. I leave it with regret, but a regret made lighter by the thought that a few brief months will find me there again.

JOHN E. REMSBURG.

MR. HEBER NEWTON is sustaining his reputation for heresy. His sermon a week ago was on the Pentateuch. "This," he said, "is the name of the first five books of the Old Testament—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy—taken as a whole. Who wrote the Pentateuch? Popularly, Moses wrote it, but the only testimony is tradition. The Christian church received the tradition from the Israelites, and there is no evidence, either in the books themselvs or outside of them, sufficient to establish the fact that Moses was their author. You ask if Christ did not refer to these writings as the product of Moses's pen. I answer that Christ was not stenographically reported, and we therefore do not know that he meant to say just that. We must remember that the gospels were not written until some time after Jesus spoke. But grant that he did say just that, grant that he knew all that has been revealed by modern criticism, who shall say that he would hav undertaken to inform his hearers critically? He spoke on a level with the knowledge of the time, and it was to an ignorant audience. Briefly, what are some of the reasons why we must conclude that Moses did not write the Pentateuch? First, on the surface he could not hav written it all, because his death and burial are described, and how could he hav described his own death and burial? Then, too, these words occur: 'The man Moses was very meek.' Would a meek man call himself meek and record it for all time? We cannot believe that that act would be one of meekness. Again, the uses of language in the Pentateuch betray the writer's residence in Palestine. There are omissions which Moses would not hav made, as when thirty-eight years of close chronological history are skipped entirely. Repetitions are made in legislation, and historical passages are duplicated. There is a double account of the water bursting from the rock, and also of the miracle of the quails. Again, there are contradictions, as in one place seven men are said to hav seen God physically, and in another place it is said that God has never been seen with the physical eye. Another important objection is that the language of the books is that of the great literary period in Palestine, a thousand years after Moses died. It describes a high ecclesiastical system which must hav been the result of long civilization. To read the account in Exodus as literally true is to stagger any one's faith. In fact, the Pentateuch is a composit work. There are bits of annals and quotations of songs. Might not Moses hav been a later editor of the five books? you may ask. Luther thought that the sermons of the patriarchs were preserved in them by Moses. But who reported those sermons? Moses could not hav done it. We see the work of three editors in the Pentateuch. Each worked on a separate plan. The first wrote in the prophetic spirit, the second wrote Deuteronomy, and the third was the author of the book of orators, who worked over the material he had in the spirit of a priest. Finally, if Moses wrote the five books, where were they during the ages that preceded the exile of the Israelites? Not until after their return to Palestine did they worship according to the law laid down in the Pentateuch. No, we know not who wrote these books."

IT is not often a better illustration of the love existing between Catholics and Protestants is seen than in the following criticism of Beecher and Marvin in the San Francisco Monitor. The sizzling of the editor's red-hot pen can almost be heard. Perhaps he wrote with a brand heated in the fires of the Inquisition. Hold your breath and read:

"We can respect common sense even when evolved from the mind of a mercenary preacher whose salary is his only incentiv to a continuance in some sectarian conventicle; but when Mr. Marvin undertakes to tell us that beastly Beecher 'is the greatest preacher in the world,' and 'the most distinguished pulpit orator in the country,' we set him down as a dunce who should be relegated to some region where the fool-killer could hav full swing in suppressing him from boring the world with any more of his balderdash. Beecher is, at best, a badly-smirched, incipient Infidel. We do not wonder that Protestantism is going to where it came from—the devil—and that people are becoming daily more and more disgusted with the strife and inconsistency of sectarianism, when we find such false prophets as Marvin occupying pulpits and worshiping as an idol one of the most degraded and double-faced hypocrits that ever disgraced even a Plymouth church pulpit.

If old Nickodamnus should ever turn preacher,
He'll find a good model in blasphemous Beecher.

We see in such dish-water decoctions as this Mr. Marvin has sent us one of the reasons why Protestants refuse to go to church on Sundays even, as they cannot endure the torture of listening to a twang-toned preacher as he disgorges a lot of heretical hash without head or tail. In fact, we often wonder that men of sense outside the Catholic church tolerate preachers anyway. What use are they? They cannot teach, because they are unlicensed quacks outside the gospel college. They hav not been sent by Almighty God as the apostles, disciples, and their successors in the Catholic priesthood hav been commissioned. Hence, such men as Marvin are regular poachers in the preserves of Christianity, and the sooner they get the grand bounce the better will it be for the cause of Bible religion, which is disgraced by being made ridiculous before the world at the hands of such shallow-pated, crack-brained cranks as those who offend the olfactory organs of every moral man by lauding the sin-laden name of Beecher in their pulpits."

JOHN E. REMSBURG has a year of solid work before him His program for December was and is as follows: Rockford, Ill., 2d and 3d; Dowagiac, Mich., 4th and 5th; Union City, Mich., 6th, 7th, 8th; Grand Rapids, Mich., 9th, 10th; Republic, Ohio, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th; Alliance, Ohio, 16th, 23d; Salineville, Ohio, 17th, 18th, 19th; Garrettsville, Ohio, 20th, 21st; New Comerstown, Ohio, 24th, 25th, 26th; Salamanca, N. Y., 28th, 29th, 30th. During January he will lecture in Pennsylvania, New York, and New England; in February and March he will work in the West; next spring he will make another and a more extended tour through the South; in the summer he goes to Colorado, and will probably extend his trip to the Pacific coast.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE.—CHRIST'S EXAMPLE AS A SON.

The masses in Christian countries hav an idea that "Christ spake as never man spake," that in character no man of all the ages can compare with him; that his life was all that could be desired—perfect, faultless; that his teachings were the purest and best ever conceived; that humanity is more indebted to Christ than to all the sages, philosophers, inventors, scientists, and philanthropists that ever lived, all put together.

To deny this, to ask where is the valuable information, the new truth, the new and better law, the original precept or valuable innovation, he originated, is to shock our sensibility and arouse our prejudice. By constant reiteration, drilling, and dinning us with the idea of Christ's perfections, from infancy to the present time, we hav come to assent to and heartily indorse all claims in his behalf, without one moment's reflection, or the slightest examination, and we are outraged at the least intimation to the disparagement of our idol.

The majority of people are quite confident that the Bible contains the positiv declaration and the clearest evidence of the divine perfection of Christ, just as clearly as it does that we should keep Sunday holy. And it really does the one just as much as the other; that is, not at all, for it does neither.

We are creatures of education, and as our whole course of instruction has tended to invest with reverence the Christian religion, few are able to weigh and judge as dispassionately the merits of their own faith as they do the faith of so-called heathens.

Suppose the New Testament was now first given to the world, and declared to be the inspired word of God; that the Christ of the gospels in all things—birth, life, teachings, death, and resurrection—fulfilled the prophecies of the Old Testament; would any intelligent, any sane person, accept it as from God, or, judging by the internal evidence, regard it as inspired? Would they not receive with ridicule and contempt the assertion, however solemnly made, that the four gospels unfold God's everlasting purpose, as manifested in Jesus Christ, his only begotten son; "that the New Testament is the transcript of the divine mind, the unfolding of the divine purpose, the revelation of the divine will;" the only plan of salvation;" "the grandest and most thrilling story the world has ever known?"

We hav no record of the life of Christ from infancy until he was "about thirty years old," and commenced his ministry, with the exception of Luke's account of his disputing with the doctors in the temple, and evincing such utter lack of respect and filial duty to his parents.

The New Testament declares, "Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow his steps, who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth" (1 Peter ii, 21, 22). We desire to approach the investigation of the life, teaching, and example of Jesus Christ with all candor, and with respect for the feelings of those who, like ourselvs until our eyes were opened, dare not even think his name save with bated breath, so great their awe and reverence. To entertain, much less express, a doubt as to his holiness and perfection was regarded as most audacious blasphemy—nothing less than the unpardonable sin. But if the New Testament is indeed inspired of God, if the internal evidence is all-sufficient to convince honest inquirers of its being the holy word of the great God, revealing to us his plan of salvation, and giving us clear understanding of the character and nature of God, by and through the revelation of the life and example of Jesus Christ, his dear son, then the more full and exhaustiv the investigation, the more clear, bright, beautiful, and steadfast must be our faith.

We hav no other purpose or desire than that the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, shall prevail. Remember we offer no Infidel, no skeptic, none but the highest Christian evidence. It is not Freethinkers alone who entertain grave doubts of the perfection of the character of Jesus, or who call attention to his lack of filial duty, love, and reverence for his mother. "It is noticeable that on every occasion of our Lord's addressing her, or speaking of her, there is a sound of reproof in his words" (Smith's Bib. Dic., Art. Mary the Virgin).

Luke describes the loss of the boy, and after three days of anxiety and grief the parents find him with the learned doctors in the temple. "And his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? Behold thy father and I hav sought thee sorrowing. And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my father's business?" (Luke ii, 48, 49). Christ thus repudiates Joseph. Since he was not really his father, some excuse might be found, although, having borne the toil and anxiety in his poverty, and with his large family of own children (see Matt. xiii, 55, 56), of caring and providing for him from infancy to youth, and the fatherly love and interest he then evinced, would seem to entitle the poor old man to some degree of respect, if not love and filial duty. But what possible reason or excuse can be found for Christ's harshness and ingratitude to his distracted, sorrowing mother?

Christian friends, is this internal evidence that the New Testament is of divine interpretation? Is this such an example to your children as you really wish them to follow? Put yourself in that poor mother's place, and answer to your own conscience, Would you regard your son blameless who so acted?

The first miracle Christ performs he takes occasion to repudiate his mother, even more harshly and contemptuously than he repudiated Joseph as his father.

"And the third day there was a marriage in Cana of Galilee, and the mother of Jesus was there; and both Jesus was called, and his disciples to the marriage.

"And when they wanted wine, the mother of Jesus saith unto him: They hav no wine.

"Jesus saith unto her: Woman what hav I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come" (John ii, 1–4).

Mothers, would you think your sons were obeying the fifth comandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother?" Would you desire your eldest son to thus address you, not in private, but in presence of his brothers and sisters and a mixed company? Would you not feel grieved, insulted, outraged? Would you turn to your other children and admonish them to take their elder brother for an example and follow in his steps? "The marriage at Cana in Galilee took place in the three months which intervened between the baptism of Christ and the passover of the year 27. When Jesus was found by his mother and Joseph in the temple, in the year 8, we find him repudiating the name of 'father' as applied to Joseph (Luke ii, 48, 49). Now, in like manner, at his first miracle, which inaugurates his ministry, he solemnly withdraws himself from the authority of his earthly mother" (Smith's Bib. Dic., Art. Mary the Virgin).

The gentle, loving mother, although of lowly birth, in her poverty she had suffered and sacrificed to minister to the wants of her first-born. Her heart yearned for some return for all her devotion, self-sacrifice, and love. But she finds no responsiv love or sympathy; nought but cold, unkind, contemptuous words from the "gentle, loving, pitying savior."

Read what Christians themselvs declare in regard to this: "When she heard of the toils he was undergoing, and they understood he was denying himself every relaxation from his labors, they therefore sent a message begging him to allow them to speak to him. Again he reproves her, again he refuses to admit any authority on the part of his relatives, or any privilege on account of relationship" (Smith's Bib. Dic., Art. Mary the Virgin).

"Then came to him his mother and his brethren, and could not come at him for the press. And it was told him by certain which said, Thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to see thee. And he answered and said unto them, my mother and my brethren are those which hear the word of God and do it" (Luke viii, 19–21).

Poor suffering mother, thinking although her son despised and repudiated her on account of her shame, her ignorance and poverty, he might yet yield to nature's claims, might at least retain some affection for his brothers and sisters. "Is not this the carpenter's son? Is not his mother called Mary? and his brethren James, and Joses, and Simon, and Judas? And his sisters, are they not all with us?" (Matt. xiii, 55, 56).

Those who had nursed at the same fount, shared the same bed, privations, and childish sports and pastimes—he would surely for their sake, if not for hers, respond in some degree to their united love and solicitude for his welfare. Coming with the most unselfish, kindest of motivs, they meet but scornful rebuff, and are shamed and repudiated before all the multitude.

Do you wonder, gentle reader, "that neither did his brethren believe in him?" (John vii, 5). Was their lack of belief in his claims of being the son of God the reason of his ignoring them? How could they believe on him, or regard him as "an example, that they should follow in his steps?" How could they admit the claim that "he did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth?" How could they harmonize his claims and his teachings with his acts? Did he not declare, "Think not I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil?" How did he fulfil the fifth precept of that law, which says, "Honor thy father and thy mother?" (Ex. xx, 12).

"For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v, 17–19).

The fifth commandment is especially enjoined in the New Testament: "Honor thy father and mother, which is the first commandment with promis" (Eph. vi, 2). "But if ye hav respect to persons ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors. For whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all" (James ii, 9,10). "Whosoever committeth sin, transgresseth the law, for sin is the transgression of the law" (1 John iii, 4). "He that committeth sin is of the devil" (1 John iii, 3).

"Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example that ye should follow his steps; who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth" (1 Peter ii, 21, 22). Did Christ honor his mother? He did not, if the New Testament record is true; he did not, if we believe the testimony of that standard Christian authority, Smith's Bible Dictionary. If he did not, then according to his own word he was a violator of the law; and by his own mouth, and that of John, and of James, a sinner. How shall we harmonize this "internal evidence?"

Even when about to meet the penalty of death, when nailed to the cross of ignominy in company with the thieves, the poor heart-broken mother comes to her son. What love can equal that of a mother for her first-born? When all else stand afar off and forsake him in the hour of his shame, defeat, and death, all his cruel ingratitude is forgotten, in her great love for her son. Yet, even in the hour of dreadful parting, instead of words of sorrow for his past lack of love and duty—instead of one sigh of regret for all the sorrow and anguish he had caused the gentle bosom that nursed him, he addressed her with no respect or affection, but in the most cold, repellant words conceivable—mark the record:

"When Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by whom he loved, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son."

Oh, the bitter, heartless cruelty, even when parting with him forever! No love, no compassion, no pity. He could beam with love on his companion John, but for his own mother only cold, constrained words—"Woman, behold thy son."

And yet the New Testament declares: "Christ suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps." May all our children shun such an example.

We almost hope to find some omission, some false translation, for it seems so horrible, so unnatural, that one who was so ready to help and comfort Mary, Martha, and other women, should act so harsh and unnatural toward the mother that bore him.

True he, as in duty bound, made provision for her, consigned her over to the care of John; but think of the cold, unfeeling, compassionless manner in which it was done. But his acts in this instance were in strict harmony with his teaching: "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother and wife and children and brethren and sisters, yea and his own life, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26).

The word here translated "hate" is in the Greek miseo, and it is claimed Christ did not mean "hate," but "love less," which is one of the definitions of the word miseo.

[Greenfield defines miseo, "To hate, regard with ill-will, to detest, abhor, to regard with less affection, love less, esteem less, to slight.]

How shall those who hav no Greek lexicon be convinced, by its own "internal evidence," that the New Testament is all truth and written by divine inspiration?

No quibble about translation can do away with the plain, positiv testimony of the New Testament that by precept and example Christ taught to hate, or slight his mother, brothers, and sisters. What, then, becomes of the divine perfection of the character of Christ? How are we to understand the New Testament declaration, "Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps" (1 Peter ii, 21).

Do we desire our children to follow his example in hate, slight, and lack of love and duty to parents?

Christ, according to Luke, says: "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" (Luke vi, 46).

Christians, then, to be consistent, must hate father, mother, brothers, sisters, wife, and children, or they cannot be disciples of Christ.

So much for the "internal evidence" in regard to the teaching and example of Christ as a son. We propose next to examin the record in regard to the temptation of Christ, and his teaching in regard to the coming of his kingdom.

A Card from Mr. Jamieson.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I would like to inform your readers that as I am about to publish an independent political newspaper, I shall be glad to respond to calls for lectures on Sundays only, anywhere within two hundred miles of Pipestone City, Minn.

Liberals in southern Minnesota, eastern Dakota, and northern Iowa will now hav a "settled speaker," in one sense. I love the work, and will take pleasure in visiting accessible points; and, notwithstanding my newspaper labor, will raise my voice every Sunday where my lecture services are desired, in behalf of Liberalism. Terms for lectures reasonable.

I hav this season given lectures in Anoka, Minn.;

Merrillan, Wis.; Maiden Rock, Wis., and am to giv my eleventh lecture in Pipestone to-morrow evening, Sunday, Dec. 2d.

I may be addressed permanently at Pipestone City, Minn. W. F. JAMIESON.

Mormonism.

In the Sunday Telegram of the 11th inst., I find the following article, which, because of the atrocious spirit of intolerance displayed therein, ought not, I think, to pass unnoticed. I hav sent to the Telegram a reply substantially the same as this. I do not expect my reply, however, to be published in that paper. I therefore ask you to giv it a place in that bravest and noblest of papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"Dr. Talmage has reopened his guns on Mormonism, the great sin of the nation. He reports a Mormon increase of 23,040 in six months, and declares that the sin [What sin? The sin of increasing so rapidly?] must be put down by force. 'We are already twenty years too late,' he says. 'How long shall the work of extirpation continue to be adjourned and adjourned? Till God's patience is exhausted and he smite the land with his righteous indignation, and we pay in obliterated homes and trampled harvests and crowded graveyards for our cowardice and neglect? The situation is correctly outlined. Mormonism must be crushed, or it will, some day, bring upon the country a terrible war."

The sentences in brackets and the italicizing are mine.

Never before, perhaps, were so much of shocking blasphemy and monstrous intolerance expressed in so few words. Here a Christian minister, of high pretensions, declares that an entire sect, 250,000 or more, of his brother Christians, who are known to be a remarkably sober, industrious, peaceable, and religious people, "must be put down by force—must be extirpated, utterly destroyed." Like a second Moses, he virtually says: "Now go and smite Amalek (Mormon), and utterly destroy all that they hav, and spare them not; but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass" (1 Sam. xv, 3). He has determined that it shall be said of Salt Lake City, and of every other Mormon city, as it was said of Jericho, and of many another city, which, by a difference of religious opinion, incurred the displeasure of the murderous myrmidons of the Bible, whom he adopts as his models: "And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword" (Josh. vi, 21). "And Joshua [Talmage] burnt Ai [Salt Lake City], and made it a heap forever, even a desolation unto this day" (Josh. viii, 28). To what extent of atrocity is not the Bible capable of leading its fanatical votaries? And God is declared, in this article, to be eager for this universal and indiscriminate slaughter of the Mormons, his most sincere, devout, and earnest worshipers, to take place—as being impatient and indignant because this horrible "work of extirpation continues to be adjourned and adjourned." Who is capable of giving a more horribly blasphemous representation of God?

And this is the bloody book and this the bloody God that are to be put into the Constitution of the United States, and this is the beginning of their bloody work! But where will that "work of extirpation" end? Will Liberals escape? Are they not feared and hated more than are the Mormons by the religious bigots of the Talmagian-monster type, who are, even now, to a great extent, controling the legislation of the country? If Mormons can be extirpated for their belief, we can be extirpated for our unbelief. Let us beware! The Mormons simply occupy the weakest point of the line. For this reason alone is the opening attack made upon them and not upon ourselvs. When they are "crushed," we may be sure that our turn will hav come. While we hold no religious opinion in common with the Mormons, while we pity and despise them for their ignorance, their superstition, their slavish subjection to priestcraft—while we should labor for their enlightenment and their elevation in the scale of manhood, a common danger threatens us, and we should make common cause with them—not as Mormons, but as human beings—against that hideously bloody form of intolerance that is heard, from nearly every pulpit in the land, crying: "How long shall the work of extirpation continue to be adjourned and adjourned?" "Go slay [because of their opinions] both man and woman, infant and suckling." Mark my words, If the Mormons "be put down by force," if "the work of extirpation" be successfully performed against them, their destruction will furnish a precedent, and will giv our intolerant enemies a power utterly fatal to us—utterly fatal to all hope of civil or religious liberty in America, if not in the whole world. Let no Liberal cry: "Peace! peace!" when, in the face of such intolerance, there can be "no peace." An hour ago, I expressed an opinion that I, who hav fought over sixty battles for this country, and who hav long suffered from wounds received in those battles, would be compelled by the triumphant church party to end my suffering days in a dungeon, because of my honest opinions. The will to destroy me and all other prominent Liberals certainly does exist among our enemies, and the power to destroy us certainly will soon exist, if we are not vigilant.

I am aware that, in the eyes of a fanatic and bigot, like Talmage, a difference of religious opinion constitutes an unpardonable sin, and that for a rival sect to make an "increase of 23,040 in six months," while his sect makes no increase at all, constitutes a "sin" which "must be put down by force." I am neither surprised nor alarmed, then, when I hear him gnashing his teeth in his chagrin, and maniacally crying in his desperation, "How long shall the work of extirpation be adjourned and adjourned?" When, however, this worse than hellish cry for blood is taken up by ably conducted papers, like the Sunday Telegram, when it is taken up by nearly every one of the 70,000 preachers of the country, and by their congregations, I am a little surprised and a good deal alarmed. Persecution is already bearing heavily upon me.

If Talmage's church could hav reported an "increase of 23,040 in six months," would that report hav constituted any proof that God was impatient to hav them "put down by force?" Would it hav constituted any proof that he was indignant because somebody did not begin upon them the "work of extirpation?" Would it not, on the contrary, have constituted, in his eyes, a proof of God's approval, a visible mark of his blessing? And why should the same thing be a proof of God's favor in his case, and of God's disfavor in the case of the Mormons?

It may be objected, however, that it is not the sin of increasing "23,040 in six months," for which Talmage, God & Co. are so impatient to see the "work of extirpation" begin against the Mormons, but the sin of polygamy. Very good. But when did God come to look upon polygamy as a sin? When did he come to be impatient and indignant with men for practicing it? Did he ever say one word against polygamy? Did he not, on the contrary, according to the teachings of the Bible, aid, encourage, and, in certain cases, even compel its practice among his chosen people? Did he not select noted polygamists to be the fathers of his chosen people, and models of righteousness? Were not one-half of the twelve partriarchs the offspring of polygamous marriages? Was God impatient with Jacob when this good man was being bought back and forth among his wives for mandrakes, peanuts, chewing-gum, etc.? Was he displeased with polygamy when he gave laws regulating its practice? Did he look upon polygamy as a sin when, for polygamous purposes, he gave the Hebrews 32,000 Midianitish virgins? Did he look upon polygamy as a sin when to David, who already had a well filled harem, he gave all at one time a whole houseful more of wives? In short, is there a single passage in the Bible, bearing upon the subject at all, that does not represent God as looking with favor upon polygamy? And if he looked upon it as right then, must he not look upon it as right now? Does he ever change his opinions? And if he looks upon it as right, must it not be right? Does he ever err in his opinions? Does not Talmage teach Mormonism himself every time he teaches that the Bible is the inspired word of God, and that we ought to follow its teachings? Can Mormonism every be put down, while the Bible, upon which it is firmly founded, is sustained? Was it not from the pagan Greeks and Romans, and not from the Jews or the Bible, that we derived our anti-polygamous ideas? So far as the war upon the Mormons is a religious one, is not the Bible entirely on their side, and is not every effort to put them down by force an act of pure persecution? So far as it is a political one, hav not the people of Utah the same right to make their own marriage laws that the people of any other state or territory hav to make theirs? Has the United States any legitimate powers except those specially delegated to it by the states of which it is composed? And hav the states ever specially delegated to it the power to put down by force one religion, and to build up another that cannot succeed very well in building itself up? And hav they ever delegated to it the power to interfere with the marriage relations of the people in any state or territory? Is not every such interference an act of dangerous usurpation and persecution? Where will it end? If it ends short of extirpation, will it not simply strengthen the Mormons? What but the present persecution of the Mormons under the Edmunds bill could hav raised their increase from about 3,000 a year to the unpardonably sinful number of "23,040 in six months?" A few more such booms are all they want?

For over forty years, I hav mingled more or less with the Mormons, and I can assure the bloodthirsty Talmage, God & Co., that these intensely sincere and earnest God-fearing, God-loving, and God-serving Christians will not yield their religion to any physical force that stops short of the complete "work of extirpation." They must be make to "pay in obliterated homes and trampled harvests and crowded graveyards," for daring to put in practice, in their own lives, an institution which, with God's full approbation and blessing, was practiced by the most holy men of the Bible. And would there be nothing "terrible" in this war of "extirpation?" And who is to perform this hideous work, now that the time to which it was last adjourned has arrived and it "must" be done? The world has never seen such a war as will result if an attempt be made to extirpate an entire great people because of their religion.

Can not Talmage, God & Co. cope with these deluded people in argument? If they can, why not do so? Do the victors in argument ever resort to physical force? Convince these people that they are in error, and the work of extirpation may be adjourned sine die. JOHN R. KELSO.

Our London Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: After many urgent solicitations from a dear old lady friend of mine, who has wasted much valuable time in offering up quite unnecessary, and, up to the present time, futil prayers on my behalf, I consented to "attend the means of grace" at the show presided over by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. It is needless to say I was not "converted" to any considerable extent, and so was persuaded to hav another try, but, alas with no more favorable result; and I fear I am now given up by my religious friend as a bad job, as it seems to be considered that if the above-named gentlemen cannot "turn a sinner from the error of his ways" (I believe that is the correct expression), the sinner must be past all redemption.

From my seat on the platform I was enabled to get a good view of the crowd of about six thousand persons closely packed together, but was not particularly struck with any prominent degree of intelligence displayed on the features of any person who came under my immediate notice. They appeared generally to be that class of emotional people who are easily worked upon by fear, and Moody seemed to hav gauged them fairly well. The general program of the meeting was plenty of chorus singing, two or three solos by Sankey, and a mediocre discourse by Moody, winding up with one or more striking anecdotes, told in a theatrical manner, of certain individuals he had known who had been proof against his blandishments, and invariably came to an untimely death, with the certain assurance, to cheer their dying moments, that they would spend an eternity in hell fire. Before those of the audience who had been stirred by this wonderfully true tale had got over their sensation of fright, a powerful appeal was made to them to come out from the unregenerate, and enlist under the banner of Jesus. This principle of striking while the iron was hot generally had the desired effect, and people were bobbing up all over the place to show they were resolved to go on the right track in future.

How long this spasmodic piety lasts it is difficult to say, though I should imagin that when the cause disappears the effect very rapidly follows it. Considering that Moody's drivelings are nothing but very commonplace clap-trap, it is at first sight somewhat difficult to account for the numbers that these so-called evangelists gather together, but the singing of taking tunes, and there being no collection, together with the curiosity of seeing how many of the audience become hysterical, has great attraction for those who hav no resources in themselvs, and liv on excitement.

The "preaching of the gospel" appears to hav a good effect on the evangelists, for they look healthy, well fed, and well clothed, and doubtless this game pays them better than any other would.

The whole of the expenses are borne by a few wealthy individuals, one of whom does not mind paying handsomely for this hobby of his, though it is reported he is not so liberal in paying those who work for him and enable him to increase his pile; but this is invariably the case.

Those who are laying up treasures in heaven like to get well into practice down here, and knowing what a snare wealth is to every one but themselvs, take very good care to keep the deadly temptation from others who might perhaps be inclined to make a bad use of it. Such individuals by a judicious investment of a small portion of their illgotten gains in church funds get plenty of defenders. They will "steal a pig, and giv the trotters in God's name," and are generally known among the devout as "the Lord's stewards," and the ungodly calumniators who question the morality of the means by which they hav enriched themselvs are scowled upon and told that they are jealous of those whom the Lord has so richly blessed.

An incident at one of the meetings rather amused me. A clergyman was called upon to pray, and after a rambling speech was good enough to inform his God that if he would induce some of the audience to affirm their conversion, he should hav all the praise and glory. That system of cheap bribery is, I believe, rather popular at such meetings, and is doubtless considered satisfactory payment to their deity, who cannot but be pleased at being flattered so nicely.

I must giv Moody the credit of appearing to believe what he says, and being earnest in his manner; but a good actor is the same in his line of business, and so far this goes for nothing. The better the acting the larger the pay, holds good as a general rule in all professions. J. D.

The Church's Debt to Woman.

It is indisputable, we believe, that to the female portion of the various sects, Christianity is deeply indebted. Without the female missionaries the church would fail to gain a great many who are now supporters. As a means of extracting dollars from the pockets of aged sinners the enticing young women who preside at the counters of the church festivals are invaluable. Did a man ladle out the impoverished oyster broth at the sociables, he would be killed. Were a man presiding over the grab-bag he might be arrested for gambling. In these two industries the services of engaging young females are indispensable. Ministerial slippers, too, without the devoted sisters, would be an unknown commodity, and the shepherds would be compelled to use the plebeian ones, that pinch the pastoral toes and wear the skin off the divinely-appointed heel, sold by the common shoe-dealer. Should all the weak and yielding sisters withdraw in a body from the church, Mr. Billings's little brochure would lose much of its effectiv force, and the Methodist parsons might become moral members of society. Should this revolution occur, Christianity would suffer a great disaster.

Connecticut has for some years been famous for the stanchness of her faith. Within the borders of that commonwealth many acts of devotion to Christ hav been witnessed. The self-sacrificing spirit of the Puritans is well known. Without a thought other than for the best interests of Christianity, the forefathers of Leonard Bacon, D.D., put the blue laws upon the statute books, and valorously enforced them. Can the world point to another state, of even many times the size of Connecticut, that so faithfully transcribed the laws of Moses for the government of God's people? Were not all of Connecticut's witches women, and without a witch how could the divines obey the command of, "Suffer not a witch to liv?" Did witches not exist they could not be killed. The fact that this benevolent verse is found in the Bible is by far the strongest argument ever adduced to show that witchcraft is not a superstitious delusion. And did not the Puritan mothers unite with the Puritan fathers in their efforts to support Christianity and exterminate witchcraft?

In these degenerate days, when the churches are loudly lamenting the decline of sound orthodoxy, it must fill the hearts of the worshipers of the only true God with joy to find that the ladies of the Nutmeg state are no unworthy daughters of their mothers. That their zeal for Christianity has in no wise abated is conclusivly proved by the action of the ladies of Wequetequock, a little hamlet near Stonington. In that place a schoolhouse has long existed in which is openly taught the theory that three times one are three, and not one, as the best trinitarians maintain, and that the earth moves around the sun, and not vice versa, as the Bible plainly implies. Not only hav these and many more heretical things been impressed upon the minds of the young in that impious schoolhouse, but the committee managing it hav resolutely refused to allow their influence to be counteracted by the establishment in the same building of a Sunday-school, these bold men, resolutely maintaining, in effect if not in so many words, that knowledge and religion hav nothing in common that they should be mixed. Their heretical arguments included, it is asserted, the common one that the tax-payers paid for a building to be used as a school, and not as a church, and it would be unjust to so use it against their wishes. Of course this argument cannot stand for a moment before a true believer, who replies that the earth is the Lord's, and all things therein and on. Nevertheless these committeemen did persist in shutting out the Sunday-school until the ladies of Wequetequock took the matter into their own delicate hands, when they were obliged to surrender.

The method by which this surrender was forced was a vigorous one, not unworthy the daughters of Connecticut's most religious people. Proceeding to the schoolhouse, which a number of men were keeping jealous watch over, the ladies scratched and buffeted these men until they retreated. One lady then crawled into the window, her devotion to the cause of Christianity being so great as to induce her to forget the presence of a great many people who were closely watching her striped stockings, which, like Henry of Navarre's plume, waved in the battle-stained air. With an ax she attacked the locked and bolted door. In this she was assisted by another lady, who superadded to her exertions the remark, as was sworn to before Justice Tippitt, "God damn the door! I swear that we will hav a Sunday-school." This remark is believed to hav had great effect upon the door, inasmuch as the first clause is an invocation to the Almighty, and he is thought to answer the prayers of the righteous. Be that as it may, the door was opened, and the Sunday-school held. The international Sunday-school lesson for that day was not, "Love one another;" neither was it, "He who loveth God loveth his brother also." The ladies had fought the good fight of faith, and victory perched upon the banners of the Lord; that is enough for us to know.

The sequel to this great labor of love on the part of the ladies of Wequetequock is one that must grieve the heart of every friend of the God of battles. Incredible as it may appear, these lady friends of the Sunday-school hav been arrested, and the man whom the heroic lady who entered at the window cut with the ax as she demolished the door, insists that the prosecution shall go on. This is undoubtedly persecution. The ladies of Wequetequock will hereafter be canonized by the church, and be held in as high veneration by the faithful as Saint Ursula. The allegation that they, to use the coarse language of the secular press, "began the row," must be resented by all true Christians, and the fact that seven righteous ladies put four heretical men to flight with only axes and crowbars for weapons must be held as an example of what righteousness can do against unrighteousness. If Justice Tippett shall fine or imprison these ladies their names will go down to posterity with the martyrs made illustrious by Mr. Fox, pictures of whose sufferings are still extant to harrow the feelings and pull the penny purse-strings of Sunday-school scholars.

Poltroonery.

It is a mean-spirited cur that licks the hand that strikes it. Thousands and thousands of Jews hav been slain by the Christians, and hardly a day passes that outrages upon the Hebrews by the Christians of Europe are not chronicled in the daily papers. These outrages are caused almost solely by religious animosity. In their condemnation the Liberal press has been vehemently outspoken, while the religious papers hav faintly deprecated them, and tried to excuse them away. Yet the Hebrew Leader, the Jewish organ of this city, prints this:

"While it must be admitted that there is a great deal of indifference among so-called religious people, it cannot be denied that the work of religion progresses. Congregations are multiplied, Sunday-schools increase, charitable institutions spring up as if by magic, religious newspapers are sustained and hav a wide circulation, and all schemes of benevolence and reformatory work find a hearty support. That there is a personal indifference to strictly religious matters on the part of many is to be regretted, but it is the natural result of the recent popular movement towards pulpit oratory and fashionable preaching.

"On the other hand, Infidelity has nothing of which to boast. It made an aggressiv spurt a few years since under the leadership of Ingersoll and his followers, but this soon died out, and the 'great movement,' which was to revolutionize the religious world, has almost ceased to be heard from. Men may easily become indifferent, but they do not readily become Infidels. They cannot in a day forget the faith of their fathers or the prayers learned from their mothers. The mushroom conceits of Infidel writers and lecturers hav their day and then perish, but the truth remains as it was. Ever since the days of Pharoah there bav been men in high stations and of great intellect who refused to believe in the Lord of Hosts, and yet it becomes manifest to each succeeding generation as to King Kavid, that it is 'the fool who hath said in his heart that there is no God.'

"This condition of affairs is exemplified by the failure of the Infidels to support their newspaper organs. They hav neither churches, nor schools, nor charities for which their money is ever asked, and hence their failure to support their few newspapers is contemptible. Their Boston organ has just sent out a piteous appeal for aid, and another cry for help comes from the one in Indianapolis. Their newspaper at Chicago is dead, and the great city of New York apparently affords no field for a newspaper of this school. There is, therefore, no room for the Infidel to take to himself any comfort from the apparent indifference which prevails in many quarters of the religious world. The indifference is but temporary—such periods will always occur—and when it passes away the old enthusiasm will be awakened. The world is naturally, and by tradition, religious—and that this cannot be changed by the argument of the Infidel, is shown by the decadence of the Agnostic press."

The person mainly responsible for the Hebrew Leader is Alderman Morris. It may be he prints this trash because he wants to curry favor with his Catholic and Protestant colleagues in the Board. But in his anxiety that "thrift may follow fawning," he forgets to be truthful. We carefully read the Freethought papers, and we hav seen no "piteous appeal." The Freethought journal in Chicago is not dead, nor are there visible signs of approaching dissolution. That New York affords a field for an Infidel paper, the Hebrew Leader knows well, for it has been on THE TRUTH SEEKER exchange list for months. Not only are its statements false as to the cases mentioned, but there are to-day more Infidel journals in existence than ever before. As for charities, it was only last week we printed an account of two munificent donations to charity on the part of men well known to be Infidels. The Hebrew Leader is stupidly ill-informed or monstrously dishonest. In our forthcoming Annual will be found an extended list of Infidel charities. Let Alderman Morris's nincompoops get that and learn something before they again put their ignorance on paper. For a body of men and women some of whose members are yet in prison for their heresy, we think that the record is one of which we may well be proud. It is a thousand times better than that of the Christian church, which never built a hospital till sixteen hundred and seventy-one years after the birth of Christ.

The increase of religion and decrease of Infidelity are about as true as the rest of the Leader's assertions. We hav during the past year printed columns and columns of admissions from the best informed clericals that even modified Christianity is not holding its own. And such Christianity as it is to-day! The sects are broken in pieces. The foremost minister of the Congregational church has denied that God created man in the manner told in the Bible, has denied that he fell, and that Christ's sacrifice can save him. What kind of Congregationalism or Christianity is that? The leading Episcopal clergyman of the country repudiates entirely the plenary inspiration of the scriptures. The men of brains are leaving the church, or holding their pulpits and teaching doctrins stranger than ever came to the knowledge of Paul. The church does not stand exactly where it did when the Jews were butchered by thousands by Charles the Fifth and his infamous son. Jewish maidens are still outraged by Christians, it is true; Jewish homes are still burnt by Christians, and Jewish men and women are still murdered by Christians, but the governmental auto-da-fé of Jews is a thing of the past. For this much progress the Hebrew people can praise the heretics.

We are thankful that all the Jews are not so craven-spirited as the Leader. In the ranks of Freethought are hundreds of of splendid people of Semitic descent. Adler's congregation is a magnificent illustration. To such a Hebrew as Felix Adler the world must pay its tribute of admiration, respect, and love. To such an ungrateful wretch as the editor of the Hebrew Leader the progressiv world can measure out only contempt.

The Miracle Business.

In the past week there has been on trial in the neighboring city of Brooklyn one of the kind of people who of old were called miracle workers. The Lourdes phenomena and the Massachusetts and Maine thaumaturgical operations were essentially of the same nature—all impostures. This of Brooklyn is painfully apparent, even to the ordinary Christian. It is near home, and therefore very plain. Did Jesus and Paul, the two chief founders of Christianity, hav their operations subjected to the searching criticism of a nineteenth century jury, we hav many doubts if they would stand higher in the opinion of the general public than does the impostor Monck.

As our more or less orthodox contemporary, the Times, says, there is something saddening in the revelations made in the course of the trial of this charlatan who has gulled so many ignorant Christians. Monck was sued by Henry, a former employee, for his wages. Monck's defense was that Henry was of no use to him, and that he had maintained him out of pure charity. Henry's case was that Monck was a pretender, whose employ he had left because no honest man would work for him. Incidentally, the whole truth came out in the course of the trial. Monck professes to cure all manner of diseases in the name of the Nazarene. His asylum is known as "The Door of Hope." His patients are chiefly women, upon whom he operates by manipulation and the imposition of hands. No decent newspaper could print in full the language used by Monck's female dupes in describing the methods which he employed in his alleged cures. One woman, who was more decent and self-contained than the rest of the mad gang, said: "Dr. Monck rubbed my heart, and then cured me in the name of the blessed master, Jesus Christ."

Numerous witnesses, chiefly women, called by Monck, testified to the miraculous gifts of healing possessed by him. Monck is said to hav made much money by pretending to cure all manner of diseases by the laying on of hands and the invocation of "divine" power. Brooklyn is a city of churches, and New-England traditions and education; and this charlatan has so completely bamboozled the women of that city that crowds of them—apparently decent and respectable—flock to the court to keep him in countenance by their applause and defend him by their enthusiastic testimony.

This puzzling phenomenon would be impossible in any country not ruled by a superstition closely allied to Christianity, if not Christianity itself. Since Simon Stylites stood upon his filthy tower the Christian has believed in no more degrading stuff than this. That a man could by laying on of hands cause a cripple to walk or the blind to see is most preposterous nonsense. It is told that Jesus did these things, but what intelligent man believes the miracles of the New Testament? Scarcely one. Tyndall's prayer gauge upset all the cherished notions of "divine" interference in mundane affairs. Sick people must get well by natural laws, as they hav been made unwell by their violation. Even a God cannot create a royal road to health. Such spectacles as this of Monck and his dupes, of Lourdes and its victims, and of all other imitations, are but sad commentaries upon the condition in which Christianity has, by its long rule, placed the world. With the dawn of science these phenomena will disappear. In 1983 people will read with open-eyed wonder and positiv incredulity that in 1883 civilized men and women submitted to such impostures. Monck is in a different line, but no more a humbug than the howling revivalists who go around the country making fools of the people. As long as folks cling to Christianity and are willing to be made ridiculous asses of in the name of the Lord, just so long will they find charlatans like Monck and his dupe Henry to take their money and pull the wool over their eyes. In skepticism alone lies safety.

A Gala Day for Newark and New York.

Last Sunday Messrs. Watts and Chainey paid this city and the neighboring one of Newark a visit, lecturing in the latter place during the day and in the former in the evening. Mr. Chainey delivered his lecture on "The Clergy" in the morning at Newark, to a large audience, Mr. Watts speaking on "The Dying Struggles of Christianity" to a still more numerous attendance at the same place in the afternoon. At the close of his lecture the League invited the Christians present to point out any errors in the positions taken and statements made, but with the insignificant exception of one old man who wanted Mr. Watts examined anatomically to see if the rib God took out of Adam was not concealed in him somewhere, another who thought John the best reporter of Christ's sayings, and a lady who believed that a biblical prophecy which was fulfilled ere it was spoken should be put in evidence, there was no response. Repeated urging on the part of the presiding officer failed to bring to his feet a solitary person who could intelligly support the Christian faith. This absence of the spirit militant, Mr. Watts remarked, he had found almost universal. Only two ministers in Canada were bold enough to debate the questions he raised. One of these admitted before he met Mr. Watts on the platform that he was not orthodox, and the other, a Wesleyan Methodist, was forced, during the progress of the discussion, to acknowledge his own rejection of the belief that there was a hell for sinners, or that Christ suffered to save anyone. In Mr. Watts's opinion, this failure of the orthodox to champion their cause was an admission of their inability to cope with Freethinkers, and a most conclusiv proof of the disintegration and decadence of orthodox Christianity.

The League was anxious to secure the services of Mr. Watts again during the week, but owing to engagements in Philadelphia, Washington, and Boston, he was compelled to decline the invitation.

The seats in the Liberal Club hall were insufficient to accommodate the people who assembled in the evening to hear both the noted orators, and camp chairs were set around the hall for the use of late comers. Mr. Chainey spoke first. His lecture is substantially the same as that printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER some months since. He is one of the most pleasing speakers in the United States, being eloquent, impassioned, earnest, and possessing a magnificent voice, flexible and well trained. It is no flattery to say that, as a lecturer, he has but very few superiors in the country. His points against the great body of loafers who fatten on the superstitious fears of the credulous people were loudly applauded by the audience, and his beautiful perorations were listened to with unalloyed pleasure.

Mr. Watts impeached Christianity, and by his citations of merciless facts more than sustained the argument of his colleague that the clergy were not only a useless body, but, with their present faith, a class of citizens positivly and aggressivly dangerous to American institutions. The church has always been the open and armed foe of science, in whatever field she explored. He impeached Christianity because it was false, because it was cruel. The good in its ethical teachings is by no means original, having been the common property of eastern nations centuries before Christ was heard of. To the oft reiterated argument of the church people, that civilization was the result of enlightened religion, he opposed the more logical statement that enlightened religion is the outcome of civilization.

During the dark ages religion had full sway, yet there was no civilization, no progress. Only when the forces of skepticism had swept away the more revolting portions of Christianity did Europe become a civilized place. Progress is due to the volume and activity of modern thought, not to an ancient dead sea of faith. Civilization has pushed man ahead; Infidelity, or Secularism, as Mr. Watts termed it, has forced the church to grow. The revelations of the nineteenth century scientists hav forced her to abandon the special creation theory, and accept a more rational explanation of the phenomena of nature. But this is not Christianity, and it is this mental growth of the people within the church that givs such irresistible force to the conclusion that Christianity has passed its manhood's prime, and is moving down the shady side of the hill with accelerating velocity. Religion would never die, but will change its base from a belief in the supernatural to the immutable foundations of mercy, charity, justice. True religion is founded on man's duty to man, not to God.

Mr. Watts's oratory is of a rugged, overpowering type, and carries conviction in every one of his logical sentences. As a debater we can easily conceive that he would be a reckless clergyman who should meet him on any field. We are pleased to learn that the prospects are good for his return to this country after a short visit to London. He and Mr. Chainey lecture in Philadelphia Friday evening, and will speak in Paine Hall, Boston, three times on Sunday. Tuesday, the 18th, Mr. Watts sails on the Wisconsin from this port for Liverpool. A merry voyage, a long life, and unshadowed prosperity are what all his friends will wish him.

Commemorativ Services.

Sunday, December 23d, will be the sixty-fifth recurrence of the birthday of D. M. Bennett. Services commemorativ of the event will be held in the evening at German Masonic Hall, 220 E. 15th street, at 8 o'clock. We trust the attendance will be large, the speeches hearty, and the proceedings in every way worthy of him who is honored. Mr. Wilson Macdonald promises that the heroic size bronze medallion for the monument will, at this meeting, be submitted to the Liberal public for approval. The exercises to be observed will be given next week.

"THE Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac" is nearly ready for the press. 25 cents.

Notes.

FREETHINKERS who desire to attend the Salamanca Convention over the Buffalo, New York and Philadelphia railroad, will send to H. L. Green for certificates to entitle them to excursion rates. Persons attending over the Erie railroad or Rochester and Pittsburgh railroad will pay full fare going and be returned for one-third fare. The Atlantic and Great Western sells excursion tickets as stated in the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE claim of the acting president of the Michigan University that Michigan is a Christian state is preposterously absurd, if the statement of the New York Sun is true, that her constitution prohibits any form of religious service in either house of her legislature, and that in consequence no chaplains are hired to lobby with the Almighty. We hope our friend Moore, who in another column replies to the gentleman, will giv his attention to this matter, and let the public know how much less the chaplainless Michigan legislature steals than other assemblies having the usual quantity of self-sufficient piety.

COMMENTING upon Mr. John H. Stratford's offer of a hospital to the town of Brantford, Ont., a Hamilton paper, with a pertinence that must be unpleasant to the Philadelphia hypocrits, remarks: "If Brantford accepts the offer upon these conditions, the city should honorably carry them out in their spirit and meaning, and not so, as the executiv of Girard College at Philadelphia has done, to bring dishonor upon a religion by resorting to a tricky evasion of the terms of a will and trust which are as specific as human language can make them. In receiving a public trust the public honor is committed; and, even though the conditions are not such as the public generally would hav imposed, it is its duty to see them faithfully carried out."

COMSTOCK's society will hold its annual meeting in a month or two, and that notorious person will make his report. This fact accounts for his activity just at this time. Since he had his deputy sheriff's badge taken from him he has been very quiet. His last seizure is thus commented upon by the New York World:

"To Mr. Anthony Comstock's zeal there is no limit. Of his authority there is no definition. Before a citizen can own and keep on his walls a work of art he must hav this censor of public morals giv his permission. It seems incredible, but it is true. Mr. Comstock claims the right to decide for us what pictures are works of art and what are indecent, and some of his recent decisions take us back to the Puritan days when all pictures were an abomination. He has just fallen upon the proprietor of a Turkssh bath uptown who had upon his walls a little engraving representing the effects of bathing upon the sick. This harmless little picture Mr. Comstock declares is indecent. Whereupon he arrests the proprietor of the bath. Such a step reopens the whole question of private rights, and the much broader one of public taste. For a community which imports Italian and French nudes in color and and Parian and terra-cotta, and buys the best pictures of Mackart and La Page, and treasures in its portfolios the reproductions of naked Greek art, it becomes a serious question whether Mr. Anthony Comstock is to be the sole judge as to which of these treasures are indecent and which we are to be permitted to own after paying for them. We should like this brave Mr. Comstock to draw the line somewhere. Where does the Venus of Milo, and the still daintier one of Thorwaldsen that has been duplicated a thousand times, belong? Is the Venus of Page, that held the culture and refinement of New York before the canvas at the Academy of Design, an indecency and the painter a criminal? Is the sensuous beauty of Canova's nymphs so much worse than Dore's illustrations of Rabelais—which latter can be bought at any book-stand—that our private parlors must be stripped? Who made this detectiv of indecency an arbiter of good taste?"

CHARLES FREEMAM, of Pocassett, Mass., the only consistent Christian in that state, has been declared insane. This is, virtually, a verdict against Christianity. It will be remembered that Freeman, fearing that God would be jealous of his great love for his child, sacrificed him, as Abraham intended to do with his son Isaac. He expected that his hand would be stayed, or a substitute divinely presented. But God did not interfere, evidently desiring the consummation of the deed. Why Abraham should be extolled throughout the world, as the father of the faithful, for only intending what Freeman accomplished, is a problem which our Christian brethren must solve. It is not our funeral. The author of a "Good Word for the Devil" viewed the subject from a sensible standpoint, at the time of the occurrence, as is seen by the following extract from that satire:

"Thus hav we seen, while I this tale hav told,
A father, at the bedside of his child,
Whom this same God of Abram, as of old,
Demanded as an offering; while it smiled
In innocent sleep, all powerless to withhold
The hand that held the knife; the mother, filled
With love, consenting to the stroke that proved
Obedience to the God their fathers loved.

In the serenity of death, it lay;
With the serenity of faith they smiled;
With the serenity of hope they pray,
In tears, obedient to what God hath willed.
Calm 'mid the cries of rage, and threats to slay
The father, who to God hath given his child.
What greater faith had Abraham, whom The Word
Proclaims the faithful servant of the Lord?

Ye Christian magistrates, ye did not dare
Arrest this man, and try him for a crime!
You taught him love parental was a snare
Set by the devil for his soul! Of him
Your God required that he all love forswear
Of home and kindred! This your constant theme.
Of you he learned that to appease your God,
His hands must dabble in his infant's blood!

Did he commit a crime? That crime you taught!
Is he insane? Your creed had made him mad!
Take either horn of the dilemma, naught
Can save you from the guilt of the foul deed!
You lock him in a dungeon, lest men note
That he's consistent with the faith and creed
Which you hav taught him. Such his wretched end,
Through practicing the precepts you commend!"

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

THE CHRISTIAN AND PAGAN MYTHOLOGIES CONTRASTED.

I desire to say something just here upon this subject, because I chance to feel in the mood for discussing it.

No religion that has ever desolated and darkened the earth has been so completely barren of all graceful fable as this same creed of Christ.

It is, from the beginning to the end of the chapter, cruel, graceless, and severe. When not repulsiv, it is, for the most part, ridiculous.

A noteworthy feature is the fact that there was scarcely one manly man in the whole lot.

Christ himself is represented as possessing, not the attributes of a man, but a lamb, and was called one.

The world does not want "meek and lowly" men, but intrepid, fearless ones, either in or out of religion.

When you meet a man who tries to play the saint, and pass himself off for a "lamb," be certain it stands ten to one that he is "a wolf in sheep's clothing," and a fraud of the most pronounced type.

The apostles, too, abundantly proved their lamb-like qualities—every mother's son of them—by basely deserting their master in his hour of peril, and taking to their heels at the first intimation that their precious necks were in danger.

Peter alone stopped running after a while, and "followed afar off," until, thinking the way clear, he slunk into the kitchen among the menials, and there, three times before the dawn, did he "deny" the master he had so often sworn to faithfully serve and follow. Or turn to the noble army of saints and martyrs (made martyrs by this same church), and observe their harmless eccentricities.

In the first place, there was the redoubtable St. Sebastian, who, according to the pictures still extant of him, possessed some remarkable antidote to successfully counteract, for a time at least, the effect of the most virulent curare, or arrow-poison.

Certainly some evil effects might be supposed to result from being skewered through and through by a whole quiver of long, sharp-pointed arrows; yet this remarkable man is represented upon the truthful (?) canvas of the "old masters" as taking his constitutional "prom." while in this critical condition, with all the sang froid and nonchalance of a Saratoga swell!

True he died in the end, but this was obligatory in him; otherwise, how could he hav become a full-blooded saint?

Then, too, there was St. Mark, who had the same infatuation for carrying a tame pet lion around with him everywhere that the "girl of the period" has today for "toting" her English "pug."

Why St. Mark selected so warlike a beast to be his "Robin Goodfellow" is not known, but I secretly suspect that the astute old saint, while permitting the world to look upon this as merely a playful eccentricity on his part, really intended to provide himself with a powerful ally, whom he could utilize, if necessary, against the scribes and pharisees. As Mark Twain pathetically puts it, in his "Innocents Abroad,"

> "And everywhere that St. Mark, he went,
> The lion was sure to go."

Then, to leave St. Mark and his lion, there were saints in abundance who considered it an unpardonable sin to ever come in contact with pure fresh water, or to trim their nails, or brush and comb their hair.

It was a pretty safe rule to follow in those "good old days," that the dirtier a man was, the more saint-hood there was about him.

I recollect reading of one fellow, whose name I now forget, who resided for a term of years on the top of a tall pole, and upon a platform only three or four feet in diameter.

The populace used to flock in crowds to see him, in anticipation of his rolling off in his sleep some fine night or other; but, being the champion equilibrist of his time, he never did, persistently declining to gratify their curiosity.

Had this saint been a live Yankee, familiar with the name of Barnum, he would hav started a dime museum by fencing in his pole, hiring an antiquated piano and a cracked cornet, and would hav died a rich man.

Now, let us turn from these grotesque and pueril absurdities, to contemplate with a serious and receptiv spirit the wondrous beauty of the vanished myths.

The ancients loved to people nature with their deities.

The golden dawn, the sylvan woodland, and the murmuring stream, were each presided over by some nymph or god.

From out embowering leaves, shy, timid fawns peeped furtivly within the shadowy glades, and roseate wood-nymphs flew, on twinkling feet, the Satyrs' swift pursuit!

Around their moss-grown altars the gray Druids sang, in weirdest cadences, their mystic chants.

Close on the panting quarry pressed the hunt, the virgin goddess foremost of her train, and, moved to love who never loved before, she kissed fair-haired Endymion where he slept!

Dread Circe reigned on charmed Calypso's isle!

The Syrens wooed the heart to welcome death!

Yoked by the Houris to Phœbus' flaming car, the radiant steeds sprang up their trackless way; and fond Penelope unwove each night her web, nor deigned to deem the lost Ulysses slain!

The lore of Greece is dead—her prophets mute; and on the Thunderer's throne another sits, but in Imagination will she hold her court when Christ and christendom be passed away!

She wore a starry splendor on her brow, like some great gem!

Hers was the soul of Beauty, nor can Time despoil those glories that are all her own!

When, eons hence, the Nazarene's shall be a by-word, or a name forgot, the great shall turn to thee, immortal land, in adoration of thy matchless worth!

> "O ye delicious fables, where the wave
> And woods were peopled, and the air, with things
> So lovely! Why! oh, why has science, grave,
> Scattered afar your sweet imaginings?"
> —Barry Cornwall.

Note.—I speak of the Druids as mythical, for, although not properly so in themselvs, so many of their rites are shrouded in mystery, and, altogether, so very little is really known concerning them, that they are well-nigh as shadowy as the myths themselvs.—E. P.

RELIGION.

Having now considered Christianity as a distinct form of worship, and having compared its mythology with those of anterior and more intellectual creeds, I shall proceed to close this present paper with an examination of religion as an aggregated whole.

Its ensanguined hand has shed more blood than all the combined wars, famins, and pestilences that hav devastated the earth within the knowledge of man.

The imbecilic cause of the shedding of this ocean of innocent blood was that one man could not, with the brain structure with which "heredity and environment" had endowed him, coincide precisely with the religious views of some other man who had come into a life-rental of another brain-structure upon dissimilar terms of tenantry.

(This matter I shall discuss at length i ı a future article upon the "Freedom of the Will.")

We speak of "civilized" man as if, forsooth, the ferocious instincts of the savage did not still dominate the heart that beats beneath the finest of linen and the costliest of broadcloth.

Be not deceived! The fiendish spirit, gloating over every throe of agony as it turned the thumb-screw or stretched the rack, is now in some instances (as that of the barbarous vivisector) turned into other and safer channels—safer for the soi-disant, scientific (?) miscreant who now, denied a human victim, stretched his bloody hand almost unchallenged to seize the faithful dog and the noble horse, dooming them to a death upon his vivisecting table, a hundredfold more horrible ofttimes than that of the Christian martyr at the stake in by-gone time.

Is it a wonder, then, that men of noble soul gaze with hot, straining eyes up into the pitiless sky, and utter in their breaking hearts the wailing cry, "There is no God?"

(The subject of vivisection, the most atrocious abuse of the power possessed by the strong to oppress the weak, I propose to consider in a separate article.)

Many brilliant minds hav recorded their conviction that society cannot exist divorced from religion. I must venture to differ from them, and believe it can. My conviction is based upon the indisputable fact that many of "the kings of thought" hav had no religion. Such men as Hume, Humboldt, Helmholz, Voltaire, Bruno, Spinoza, Jefferson, Shelley, and America's own peerless exemplar of eloquence, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, hav, despite their ungodliness, found themselvs as well, or better, off than their more devout brethren who exude sanctity from every pore, and fairly "slop over" (if I may be permitted the term) with prayers and piety at every jolt of life's uneven road.

Many thinkers esteem religion a necessary check upon the passions of the ignorant multitude, deeming that were it abolished the spirit of Communism, defying all restraint, would riot in blood and pillage.

If this be true, it is a significant fact, and one which I recommend to the consideration of the champions of the refining and civilizing influences of religion, that Catholicism, the most zealous and severe form of Christianity, is at the same time that form whose devotees are the most densely ignorant, bigoted, and bloodthirsty!

The politic and sagacious pontiffs of the church of Rome hold over their cowering subjects the scourge of fiery torments in a world to come, extorting, by means of their equally ridiculous threats of hellish punishments, and promises of heavenly rewards, the last sou wrung from the beaded brow of toil by the dextrous hand of fraud and cunning craft!

No wonder that when some daring spirit, a bold explorer of their forbidden secrets of hypocrisy and guile, flashes his dark lantern in upon some unsuspected black abyss of knavery and crime, they seek to crucify him and his nobler creed!

Be not deceived! Within his powerful grasp the lynx-eyed priest of Rome still holds the lash that keeps alone his bloodhound pack in check; one word, one sign from him, and those thrice-terrible fangs would close in iron death upon their pray!

The innocent white throat of Love, the palsied limbs of Age, the smile of artless Infancy, would prove alike their bloody spoil!

Why holds this hour the church of Rome her murderous pack in check? Why not recall once more the headsmen and the rack? I answer, for one cause, and only one! She dare not! Her power, but not her will, to harm, unharmed, is gone! The envenomed serpent of her wrath has slacked its scintillant and deadly folds, because to-day enfranchised Thought would powder in the dust beneath her heel its glittering, crested head!

Rome could indeed again bathe earth with blood, but 'mid that crimson ruin she herself must sink, never to raise her hydra heads again! That majestic power which launched her fateful edicts against the thrones of kings who suppliant bowed beneath her haughty yoke, must, in the march of time, be swept away! Already with her fanged jaws she dare not strike! From the arch-murderess of all time—a court whose dire decree brooked no appeal—she has become the shameless robber of the sons of toil!

She passes to her doom; and in her sordid age, denied the draught of blood, she basely clutches in her frantic grasp the sweat-embittered savings of the poor!

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Freethinkers and Monopolists.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a report of a meeting of the Boston Liberal Club, in which Mr. Mendum is reported to hav said: "What would become of the country without capitalists and monopolists? The people could not be depended upon. They had not even sense enough to accept the proposition of the originators of the Paine Memorial, and thus they were very near losing this edifice. A few monopolists, however, came forward, and the building was saved."

I hope Mr. Mendum was not correctly reported; but if so, then his remarks deserve some notice.

Supposing the statement to be true, that capitalists hav contributed the most money toward the Paine Memorial Building, is such an argument in favor of monopoly deserving of the slightest respect?

They contributed because they had the means, and they well knew, that, if it is not paid for, it will fall into the hands of monopolists in the end; while the people, poor, and growing poorer because of the infamy of monopoly, hav nothing to giv.

But I deny the inference that must be drawn from Mr. Mendum's statement. I deny that Liberalism has anything to thank monopoly for. Even take the long list of subscribers to the Paine Memorial, and you will find that four-fifths, if not nine-tenths, are people who labor for their daily bread. The same is true of those who so generously contributed in aid of Mr. Bennett, and toward his Monument Fund. And I know that every Infidel missionary and speaker in the country will bear me out when I say that the earnest workers in the cause of Liberalism throughout the land are almost invariably persons who work hard for a living, while the capitalistic Infidel holds aloof and courts popularity by contributing to the churches. Of course there are honorable exceptions among the latter class, but the poorer Freethinkers contribute, in proportion to their means, a thousand times as much as the wealthy.

Let the publishers of Freethought papers tell us among which class they number their subscribers mostly; and who are the most energetic in spreading the light by laboring to extend the circulation of those papers, the monopolists, or the people of toil.

I regret deeply that any Infidel, especially, should contribute to the continuance of the infamous system that is sapping the foundations of our rights, and rapidly reducing the common people to the condition of slaves. And I trust that Mr. Mendum will feel ashamed of having uttered such sentiments as are attributed to him.

W. F. PECK.

[The above criticism seems to be based on a mistake. That Mr. Mendum might hav opportunity of reply we forwarded Mr. Peck's communication to him. He says:

> FRIEND MACDONALD: I hav only to say that your Boston correspondent makes very poor reports of our meetings generally. In reporting my speech (if it could be called a speech), he gave a very incorrect statement of what I said, or of the idea I intended to convey of the uses of corporations, or what are styled monopolies. However, it is not worth noticing. Wishing you success, etc.,
> I am very respectfully yours, J. P. MENDUM.

We cannot think that our respected friend Mendum is with the monopolists as against the people.—ED. T. S.]

The Freethought Directory.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am very desirous of greatly increasing the number of names of outspoken Freethinkers in the "Freethought Directory," and of increasing the circulation of the Freethought journals, and therefore will do this: To any person sending me ten names for the "Directory," with twenty-five cents each, I will send THE TRUTH SEEKER or Boston Investigator six months. For twenty names, and twenty-five cents each, THE TRUTH SEEKER or Investigator, as they choose, one year.

Letters from Friends.

LONGMONT, NOV. 20, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find order for $1.50—$1 for the Bennett Monument Fund (I would not be too late to contribute my mite for that, though I hav feared I would be); twenty-five cents for Mr. Bennett's "Answer to Christian Questions;" and twenty-five cents for a copy of Col. Billings "Crimes of Preachers."

As a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish to express my thanks to Mr. Macdonald, and my commendation of the manner in which he edits the brave and able journal. Manager and editor hav the best wishes of myself and family.

Yours faithfully, M. H. COFFIN.

DETROIT, NOV. 19, 1883.

MR, EDITOR: I hardly expected to see my letter in print; but I thank you for doing so, as I consider the question of the amount of free money in circulation as the very foundation of all reforms. I was sorry to find a large mistake in one statement. There were sixteen hundred and fifty millions of legal tenders destroyed to make room for (or rather) to make the want of money so great as to compel people to borrow bank paper to do business with and pay interest for the same; and the people hav been starved into the faith of the divine right of the slave-owning money lender to draw his interest or pound of flesh. And before the Liberals of this country can hope to destroy any other divine institution, they must destroy the demon of interest. The government should issue its own legal money and put all its people out of debt.

Fraternally yours, J. H. WOOD.

ROCKFORD, NOV. 26, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you an article clipped from the Rockford Daily Register, of Nov. 23d, in relation to the opening night of the great M. E. bunco steerer. This is the most appropriate application I can think of for a person who, for a certain specified sum (say from $100 to $150 per week), agrees to steer into the clutches of the sky-pilots a certain number of lambs. They to fleece the lambs, while he fleeces the church. And from what I hav seen and heard of Harrison's work, I think that he gets the most wool. I had hopes of being on hand to attend Harrison's opening night in Rockford, in order to write him up for THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal paper, as I did last spring in Decatur. But as he played his usual advertising dodge, of representing what a glorious work he was doing in Danville, and of the reluctance of the people there to let him off, etc., it became quite uncertain when he would be here. So I made a two weeks canvassing trip into Southern Wisconsin, and did not get back until the day after his opening. Had he been here on the night he was first advertised for, November 6th, I should certainly hav been on hand.

The new Centennial M. E. church here, is one of the finest architectural church edifices in this state, and as there are four other M. E. churches in this city, the "boy preacher" has evidently "struck a bonanza," and will get fine plucking for the coming winter here. F. F. FOLLET.

HATBORO, PA., NOV. 29, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just met a Christian bigot, who came into my livery office to hire a team (this day set apart to giv thanks to an imaginary god). As this man, of the Presbyterian faith, turned his eyes upward, he beheld a large photograph of Col. R. G. Ingersoll, which has been hanging in my place of business for some time. He ruffled up at the sight of it, as a turkey-gobbler would at the sight of a red flag, saying to other parties who happened to be present, that that man was not fit to liv and ought to be shot; followed by a long list of threats and lies, that no one but a bigoted Christian would be guilty of.

I hold Col. Ingersoll, in my views, the noblest, grandest, and ablest leader of Liberalism. And I would not allow any one to abuse, scandalize, and lie about him at my place and quietly submit. Consequently, this man of God soon had my views on the subject, which were not, I think, unreasonable or ungentlemanly. He did not tarry long to argue the question, but left, hissing, through his teeth, that such people would sing another song before they died. He did not want the team after he found I was an Infidel; as much as to say, You should hav your bread and butter taken from you. When I am compelled to be a slave to the church and Christian bigots in order to do business, I want the lie taken from the Constitution of this Government. And instead of quoting "A government by the people and for the people," substitute "By God, and for the priests." But, to do justice, I wish to say that the church people here, though pretty hidebound, are not all alike. This man of vengeance, whose name is Charles Stillwell, has not, I should judge, had the benefit of hearing the Spiritualists, who hav been trying, for the past four or five summers, at Neshaminy Falls, near here, to teach such bigots the folly of their ways, and to whom we owe much for the liberty we enjoy. Although I am not a Spiritualist, in a sense of the word, I do not think too much credit can be given them for the great work of Liberalizing the people done by them. I hav already, by this long article, infringed on the columns of your valuable paper, but I feel this to be one more case to remind Liberals that our work is not yet done. Respectfully, A. J. READING.

BANGOR, Dec. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Last week I called upon Mr. A. Lewis, at his cigar factory (in Bangor), and found him, as ever, ready to help from bondage to freedom. Freedom! the word of words; the key-stone in the mighty Anglo-Saxon arch!

Mr. Lewis is of our young America, and does the largest cigar business in Maine. He is an outspoken Infidel and dares giv utterance to what he thinks and knows to be right.

Among his workmen are three readers of the best paper published, viz., THE TRUTH SEEKER. With Lewis was a subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one of our local, Jew-Bible ministers. Not in good old Samaritan style did I kick him and go by on the other side, but I fired in my little mite in so good a cause.

In this section of Maine some good work can and should be done to diffuse light among our brothers who are in the dark but really wish for "more light." At least one hundred copies of your paper should come to this office each week. Had I the time to spare, the list should hav that proportion. Very few of the younger men in trade, business, or in fact of any education, believe in a six-foot God of kind, color, or sex. I say this from no guess-work, but from a standpoint of knowledge, having talked with them in person. The field is ripe for thrusting in the sickle of truth and harvesting all except bigots, hypocrits, and plunderers.

There is another minister I wish to reach (a first-class man), and to do this I will send the paper to my father and himself under the name of Phillips and Wetherbee. They will read it. Father will, because he takes a high hand in any thing which is anti-religious. Mr. Wetherbee will for two reasons; first, he votes in sympathy with us, and second, he promised he would, which is a perfect guarantee.

Inclosed please find fifty cents to pay the same for three months. Am doing all I can to help the paper into families where it is sure to do good.

Respectfully, F. F. PHILLIPS.

MILWAUKEE, OR., NOV. 17, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to spin a little yarn about missionary operations. In November, 1839, I sailed from New Bedford, Mass., in the bark Waverly, belonging to Gideon Howland, on a three years' whaling cruise. The skipper's name was William Munroe, and he lived in Nantucket. When we got off Cape Horn, and were lying in stays on account of rough weather, the captain called out to the steward to go below and send on deck that barrel of missionary cheese; for, said he, "I think it is time to commence on that." The cheese came on deck, and the captain called out for all hands on board to circle round that cheese. Of course we all circled around—thirty-two, all told; then pointing to the head of the barrel, he told us to read. "There," said he, "you see that there is nothing written on that head but 'Missionary Cheese,' all done up nice in white chalk, consigned to nobody and to no place. The truth is, it was only intended for this vessel, and I hav a little yarn to spin, and my subject is 'Cheese.' I came up to Bedford three days before we sailed, to attend to the ship's stowing, and I saw stuck up all over the city as far as I went posters calling the people together to do something for the destitute and suffering missionaries in the Society Islands, for the Waverly would sail in a few days, and everything would go directly to its destination, as its commander was such a nice man, and there was no risk to run," etc. Said he: "I went one night just to witness the trick, and there was taken up that evening a little over four hundred dollars. The thing had been going on for a week, and was kept up till I pulled out; and just as I was loosing from the wharf there came down a dray with this lonely barrel of cheese, and this is all." He continued: "They must hav taken up two or three thousand dollars in that operation. That is just the reason why there are no more Christians found at sea. They are all acquainted with the trick. It is probable that Gideon Howland, the owner of this vessel, threw in the first twenty, played stool-pigeon, and got this barrel of cheese for it."

My name on the ship's books is Wm. Cressey. I am particular, for it will bother this lying fraternity to lie me out of the story. I am too well acquainted with this flock of Christ's lambs to not shut up the bars as I pass along. E. W. CRESSEY.

CATHLAMET, W. T., NOV. 30, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Observing but little zeal evinced by Liberals generally toward the erection of a Bennett Hall, it would seem to indicate that we are not overburdened with any surplus metallic machinery imperativly necessary to the raising of costly edifices in order to perpetuate the memory of our departed apostle of liberty, and for which the Paine Memorial is a standing witness, much to be deplored. Yet, finding the Monumental Fund still mournfully lagging in its estimated requirement, you will find inclosed $1 for that praiseworthy and highly incumbent duty rightfully ours, as it cannot help but constitute, in the eyes of the world, our just zeal in all honorable vindication of the man, D. M. Bennett, who winced not, even to martyrdom, in behalf of humanity; while it cannot act otherwise than a crushing reproach to our self-righteous pharisees, who hav now no other alternativ but to reap the whirlwind of their diabolical nineteenth century inquisition. Respectfully, H. A. ELIOT.

SQUAN CREEK, IDAHO, NOV. 28, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, to pay for my subscription and that of Mrs. Mary E. Lippencott.

I saw in your paper some time since an article from a gentleman in Florida in regard to a destitute widow and orphan asylum. It struck me very forcibly at the time, and I hav waited in vain for a response from some one more capable than myself. Are the Liberals of this country willing to hav it continually flung at them, What are you going to giv us for our superstition and bigotry, and what are you doing for mankind in this world you say we should make the most of? I for one say, Let us Liberals of America go to work. Build a home for the poor orphan, in some central point, where he may be fed and clothed, given an education free from superstition, and brought up to habits of industry, so when he might go out into the world he would be an honor to the same. Some will say that we are reaching too far too soon, and that we are too few. Let us see. No consistent Liberal givs one cent to any gospel shop, or puts one penny in the plate, if guilty of being present when passed. Cannot each and every one giv the same as if burdened with superstition yearly, and the pennies weekly for such a purpose? Then there should be at least ten thousand who can giv five dollars, one thousand ten dollars, five hundred twenty dollars, one hundred five hundred dollars, ten one thousand dollars, etc.; and perhaps for such a purpose there might be some Liberals able to giv thousands, and who would do so; if not in life, they would not forget so good an object, and would say their prayer before going to sleep. There must be many Liberals throughout the nation in business, with a surplus of this world's goods, too much engaged in their own affairs to giv this a thought, who if reminded would giv bountifully, knowing affluence is often brought to the bottom of the ladder, and perhaps their own offspring might, through adversity, need a shower of quails. What would the amount do that Liberals ought to giv within the next two years? It would at least buy one or two hundred, and perhaps more, acres of land away from city or town, where it could be bought cheaply, with a water power for coming time. Then cheap buildings built thereon, and that would (having the land and power) giv the rising generation of Liberals something to work with, viz., make a home for poor, helpless, young human beings—a home for the aged and decrepit who could look after them, and vice versa. Schools could be established; those adapted taught to cultivate the soil, and at some future time (when Liberalism is more plenty), having the power, factories could be started and run by the material contained within itself, making itself self-supporting.

Had not we Liberals better do something in this line, if able, than giv the preference after a while to probate judges, lawyers, and hypocritical men of God going after their hard earnings while taking a rest? And if it is not sleep, will we not be better prepared to walk up to the said heavenly father and giv him a friendly shake of the hand? Anyhow, it would giv us all pleasure in this life.

I will giv five hundred dollars for said purpose, and should no misfortune or Christian robbers cross my pathway again, will giv as much more at some future time. Call it the Bennett Asylum, brethren, and if the architecture of the Albany Penitentiary were thought suitable, so mote it be.

Dr. York has been among us doing good work on some poor soil. Am sorry to say he received a small taste of that of which Bruno had a full dose, and of which, in later years, D. M. Bennett had also. Let bigots and ignorance persecute; it helps the cause of truth and right, and such it proved in his case. He in his circuit has the little book for sale, "Poems of Freethought," compiled by Dr. James L. York, of San Jose, Cal., which he sells at one dollar per copy. One poem of itself is worth the price, viz., "Backbone, Hav We All Got It?" Send to him your dollar, and get something good. No whale story, but the first poem is, "My Religion."

Yours for truth, A. G. CHURCH.

COLD CREEK, Dec. 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed check for $3, for which change the tab on the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, as I cannot do without it very well; when it fails to come on Saturday night, I hav to get the old Jew-book and read till I become disgusted and put it aside. Don't know but I ought to be thankful for it; if it had not been for reading it, I should not hav been an Infidel. I can't see how anyone can read it and not reject it, when it it so full of obscenity and absurdities. When will the Liberal leaders giv us a platform so I can vote against Christianity, etc.? I hav tried to get some subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER; some hav a poor excuse and others are so bigoted they won't read. I hav a poor neighbor (a blind soldier), and his wife reads it for him. If you hav not received subscriptions enough to build the monument to Brother Bennett, keep one dollar, and credit the other two on THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours fraternally, THOS. PECK.

HAMILTON, Nov. 30, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Freethinkers are frequently asked what has Freethought done for the world. And the taunt is frequently thrown out that they never contribute to charitable institutions, etc. The city of of Brantford was in need of a hospital and was devising means by taxation to remedy the necessity. Here a gentleman, a citizen, comes forward and offers to donate a hospital, new from the builders' hands, and which shall cost $12,000; besides, he will endow it with $400 per year; and subsequent to this offer, his lady has offered to furnish it out with stores and supplies gratuitously, on the simple condition that it shall be strictly non-sectarian, no minister, priest, or layman ever to be allowed to hold service within its walls, unless by the expressed wish of an inmate, and only then to that inmate. Some years ago, a gentleman in this city died and left $17,000 to found a home for destitute boys, but it was unconditional; but I am informed that he was a skeptic, although the admirers of his bounty claim it could only be the action of a Christian. And often does the Christian thief play the same game elsewhere. Yours for the truth, GEO. MADDOCKS.

CHAMPLIN, MINN., Dec. 1, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: For more than eight years I hav been a steady reader of your much-loved paper, and I am of the firm opinion that its success has been due in a great degree to the steady course its editor has taken in exposing the absurdities contained in the holy books. There are nine-tenths of our reading people that never read a chapter in them, and many of these take it for granted that the old books are about right, and probably may remain so until they stumble over some Freethought paper containing the exposure of some of those ridiculous stories—such as Noah and his flood, Samson and his foxes, Daniel in with the lions, a child begotten by a ghost. Then they will get their eyes opened and look about for the truth.

Bennett brought out most of the noted characters and incidents in the Bible under such light as to plainly expose their absurdities. But there is still one noted character not delineated by any writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so far as I hav noticed, and that one is Melchisedec. The first account given of him we find in the 14th chapter of Genesis, and from the account given there, that he was king of Salem, and that on the return of Abram from the rescue of his brother from the five kings, he came out and met Abram with bread and wine. He was not only king of Salem, but priest of the most high God. Now, what a great king and priest could be doing away out there in an insignificant little Arab village, is more than I can imagin.

But, in pursuing this narrativ, we are apt to encounter a little error, for it seems that when Abram was informed of the capture of his brother by the five kings, he took his servants and pursued them to Dan. Now, this name must hav been given to that division of land that fell by lot to the tribe of Dan, and if so, Moses never wrote the account, for the division of land among the tribes did not take place till about five hundred years after Abram's time. But this is not all of the kingly priest, for if we follow him into the New Testament, Paul, in the seventh chapter of Hebrews, givs him this exalted pitch: "For this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God, met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him. To whom Abraham gave a tenth part of all; first being by interpretation king of righteousness, and after that also king of Salem, which is king of peace: without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life, but made like unto the son of God, abideth a priest continually."

The history and appearance of this man on earth must hav surpassed all the miraculous events the world ever imagined. The birth and works of Christ cannot make a shadow beside Melchisedec. Why! he had no father, not even a mother, nor a relativ, nor a descent. He was not created or made out of something. He had no beginning of days, nor will he ever subside. But he was king and priest of Salem, and may be he is yet—at least, we hav not heard of his abdication.

Now, my readers, what are you going to make out of this little story? I think it cannot afford any other construction than what it reads, consequently it must be a fact or a big lie. J. KINSER.

WILLIAMSTOWN, O., Dec. 4, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: When reading the description of hell in THE TRUTH SEEKER, given by an English divine, it recalled to my mind my early religious training. My parents being of a religious cast of mind, and that of a very superstitious quality, we children were taught some very queer doctrins. One was, that if we were disobedient to our parents, a great bird would be sent to pick out our eyes. It made me afraid, and I asked my parents how many bad boys' eyes they had ever known to be plucked out. They said none, but that the Bible said it would be done. The Sabbath day was a day of terror in place of rest and pleasure. They taught us many other doctrins that held us in fearful suspense and naturally curtailed the innocent pleasures of childhood and youth. And even to this day, though now in my 54th year, and with all the light and knowledge shed by Liberal books and literature generally, and the teachings of reason, it is with great difficulty I can rid myself of many of those youthful impressions, though never so foolish.

When I reflect on the greater part of my past life, and the pleasures and enjoyments I ignored, I feel provoked to think such was my lot, and all this simply because I was manacled by religious enthusiasm. What a tyrant!—a hard task-master and very small pay. We were taught we had no right to think there was anything wrong which was taught in the Bible, and to question anything the dear minister said was worse than high treason, and if one of us dared to hint at a contradiction in "holy writ," we would hav expected God to hurl his eternal vengeance on our heads at once. We were taught that God was angry or pleased with us just according to what we did or said, changing any minute to suit circumstances.

What a pity all children cannot hav the proper training while their minds are so susceptible to good and lasting impressions. If good impressions acquired in childhood and youth are as hard to lose as false ones in manhood and old age, then for the sake of humanity, let us all try to make good impressions on our children's minds, so there will be no room for the reception of falsehood. Of course, my parents were conscientious, and looked well to the religious teachings they gave their children, and felt they were doing God service. But how glad we are to see these old orthodox fogyisms fading away, and we hope they will soon be things of the past; and may a new era emerge when the youthful mind will be at liberty to grasp and investigate the teachings of reason, and be guided by its light and truth.

For the continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER I inclose money. When this is absorbed I will remit. I hav in the past three years bought and distributed a great many copies of Liberal and Spiritual papers. The publishers of these hav been very liberal in supplying many copies free, which I hav handed out, and many hav been as a nail driven in a sure place. They hav brought about almost an entire revolution in religious affairs here. It was a sad affair for the churches here when one day three dear ministers mounted their pulpits to crush Spiritualism and Liberalism. "They reckoned without their host" this day, if I did hav to fight them single-handed and alone. I put my best licks in right and left till they weakened. B. D. EVANS, M.D.

LE MOORE, CAL., Nov. 22, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: As our subscription expired Nov. 13th, will forward in renewal to sustain as good a Freethought journal as this continent affords. We obtained our money-order the 15th, but circumstances hav proved unconceivable delay in posting our brief letter. With firm reliance for success in the cause we hav espoused as truth seekers, and with kind words of encouragement and commendation in your arduous labors and brave work for the subduing of false systems and supernatural worship of our kind, I would shake your hands as worthy successor of our dear lamented brother, D. M. Bennett, whose place you fill with marked proficiency. We read, with pleasure, your graphic report of the Rochester Convention, held in New York. Could Liberalism become a unit, and all minds be able to lay aside prejudice and minor differences of opinion as qualified adherents in so grand a cause, the great struggle now pending would be of brief duration. Could all minds, freed from the shackles of the church, catch the full warning of those ponderous claims made by ecclesiastical associations determined to gain full power in church and state, in mental and spiritual authority over the massess, through these claims, they would see the essential work of the hour. As all secular or spiritual growth rests qualifiedly right here; as our national successes center in the establishment for the future, first of all, an absolutely free moral government, systematized service to natural and spiritual edicts under practical reign of science and law, must be man's guide to a higher and logical estate. And never, until the bloody prototype ensemble of that stultifying power—supernatural symbol of dying God and man-made saviors, both pagan and modern, with all creeds and rituals, are buried fathoms deep, can the race in mass arise to a positiv knowledge of a denominate philosophy, distinguishing a subjectiv premis, inherent rights, virtual possessions, with individual representation of moral and spiritual responsible status, answering through obedience to every known principle or benign rule in the category of law. While innate inherent attributes, in conformity and harmony with natural and spiritual qualifications, are index-figures pointing the mind to all light, knowledge, and truth. When the mind, through unfolded perception, comprehends that the motiv power of all reform lies within that, through incipient elements and evolutionary laws in primary constitutionality in being, it is born almoner of spiritual wealth through coeternal union with omnipresent intelligence. As priority in attributes are infinit, principles do necessarily obtain, ere finite intelligence could stand defined as representativ actor, responsible to any moral principal, Secular or social virtue under law. Thence the logic of life center, and in here in constitutional material and spiritual compounds, primary essences conjoined in eternal union as matter and mind, or in other paraphrase, spirit essence in replete and o-eternal unity with substance and infinit indivisibility, matter and mind, immutable existences in relativ and absolute being. Thence in the discovery of evolutionary laws through principles in science of the transposition of elements in the scales of principles through systems of analogy in planetary laws of action and revolution; that, what emphatically obtains in the primary series as constitutional premis in law, must, as true science, apply to all general, manifest, representation of an immutable order. Hence, through indemnified law, noting that nothing in the universe of matter can be destroyed, the analogy holds good as ethical service in compound principles in integral union and supplemental law. That mind being or existing as integral factor, and in positiv connection and central, activ essence, and electric and magnetic force, moving all substance, thus, in strict confirmation with electric currents, the essential principle of all life, and the magnetic affinity existing between mind and matter, spirit and substance, they thus stand as conjoined qualities throughout infinit degrees and interminable space. Thence through the logic of an eternally cemented kinship, in physical, mental, and spiritual relations, the trinsic marriage of human conscious edicts, as ultimates in the evolutionary scale of principles in true line of progress. Therefore, through defined analogy, in the realm of elemental classics, are substantiated, not only eternal transposition in the scale of matter, but the indubitable sovereignty of mind over the same ad infinitum. Hence, as propositions, commending an immutable premis, conclusions representing foregoing thesis are correlativly sustained. To wit, the constitutional unity of spiritual attributes, elements, and substance, with the positiv indestructibility of these affiliations, homogeneous principles, and intelligent judicial line of law and forces.

In concluding our communication, allow us to add in consecutiv accord with objectiv and subjectiv attributes, that, in the very nature of things, mankind must work out their own salvation; while it is through spiritual preferment, attained through wisdom, knowledge, and the love of pure moral action, that the race stand redeemed; thence as natural to be saved as to be born. Thus, in review of all progressiv law in attainment, carnal material rule, returning hate for injuries received, but adds fuel to the flame and emphatically declares the actual reign of authority as in the animal kingdom of dominant superior strength and force. Through moral ethics man shall attain to spiritual hights, to the apex of the mountain of light; standing full-orbed through integral law as an intelligent graduate through intellectual and spiritual majority; thence abide.

Book Notes.

"CRIMES OF PREACHERS in the United States and Canada from May 1876 to May 1883. Third edition. Translated out of the original newspapers, and with previous translations diligently compared and revised." By M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa.

It is not a pleasant task to record the short-comings of our fellow-men. It is only because we think the interests of morality, of justice, and of truth require it that any one can be justified in making the expose that is here presented to the world. Theology is now only tolerated because of a widespread belief that it is the best conservator of morals, but if, as this record goes far to show, the teachers of theology are themselvs the most corrupt class of men, then we at once ask, What is the use of further upholding a system that debauches its own exponents till they rank lower in the scale of morality than the average of men?

This work of Mr. Billings has been issued annually for three years, each new issue being much larger and fuller than the preceding. The edition before us comprises 100 pages of closely printed matter. Published by THE TRUTH SEEKER, 33 Clinton Place, New York.—Lucifer.

Miss Gibson Seconds Mr. Richardson's Motion.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of to-day I read a letter from O. Richardson, of Bronson, Levy county, Florida, in which he offers twenty acres of land for a "Bennett Home for Aged Liberals," and one thousand orange-trees from his nursery to be planted on the home free of charge. Will not Liberals look at this generous offer and see if it is not worth accepting? It may be thought by some that the location is too far south. Liberal, Mo., has a home-prospectiv for the orphans of Liberals; why not Bronson, Florida, hav a home for the Liberals themselvs? Friends, who will move in this matter? ELLA E. GIBSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Our Children.

There are Willie and Katy, Johnny and Joe,
Mary, Adelia, Fanny, and Prue,
With Tommy and Jane, and Augustus, also,
And Rob, and Dick, and dear little Sue.

But I cannot tell all their names, as they come
From south and north, from the east and the west;
Big boys and sweet girls, from the field and the home,
And tottlers waiting to be caressed.

With round, rosy cheeks, and bright, laughing eyes,
Pretty dimples, that hide-and-seek play;
With dear little heads, so wonderfully wise,
That they puzzle the heads that are gray.

Who are these children, and where are they going,
With basket, and satchel, and pail?
And do they wander abroad, without knowing
The temptations that wait to assail?

We're little truth seekers, they answer quite plain,
And we seek for the truth everywhere;
And as we press forward the knowledge we gain
Will banish afar every snare.

Katy's Letter.

T—— F——, Nov. 25, 1883.

DEAR FRIEND: It is some time since I wrote you, and I hope you will forgiv my negligence. I shall try to do better in the future, for yon know the world is all beginning.

I like the Children's Corner very much, and I wish I were a writer. I would contribute to its columns. I hav grown some since you saw me last, and you would be surprised to see me now. Just think—I am sixteen years old! I begin to feel quite aged; I do, indeed. I hav not been to Fall River since I saw you there, but I hav been once to N—— B—— to see brother, who is living on a farm for two years. Sister is living with father, and goes to school right along. I hav been to school steady, until about a year ago, when I went into a store to assist through the holiday season, and, strange to say, I hav remained there ever since. I keep account of all that goes out, and all that comes in the store, and see that all comes straight at night. I am getting a good deal of practical knowledge, and learning some about the ways of business. I would like to go to school, however, a little more, and perhaps I may sometime. I hope you and your mother are in good health, and that Robert, your parrot, is also well. Our parrot, Billy, is lively as a cricket, although twenty-seven years old! But he does not appear to feel near as old as I do. Polly, our other parrot, is visiting with an aunt of Mrs. H., and the cockatoo is at the home of another friend. They hav good homes, and so we are satisfied. I am attending a lecture course, and hav heard Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, G. P. Gilman, and others. I want to improve my mind all I can, for I know that the more I learn, the better qualified I shall be to undertake the work, and perform the duties of life. I read our papers, and keep the run of what is going on. I am deeply attached to our dear TRUTH SEEKER, and more than ever is it welcome now, since you provide such beautiful and interesting stories in the "Corner."

With love, I remain your true and grateful friend, KATY.

And now, Who is Katy? you ask. Well, Katy is—Katy, and a very dear friend of mine, or I should not hav taken the liberty to put her letter in print. But she thought she did not write well enough to come into our Corner, and I want her to see how nicely her letter reads. I know it will sound well to all who read it, for Katy is a good girl, and has many sound, sensible ideas.

Katy is one of three motherless children, who were born and reared in the Catholic faith. After the death of their mother, the father of these little children changed his views somewhat, upon religious matters, and felt a desire that his children should grow up unbiased in matters of faith and worship. Strenuous and persistent efforts were then made by the priests to keep the children within the fold of their church, their endeavors amounting to almost to a system of persecution. They were, at length, placed by their father in the care of the state, as the surest safeguard and protection, while the father was battling for bread, for he feared his little ones might be abducted in his absence by the unscrupulous devotees of a faith that winks at many unjust and evil courses.

About this time a dear and noble woman in a distant town wrote me inquiring if I knew, in all my acquaintance, a little girl without a home, whom she could take to her heart and love as her own child. She had no little girl—no little boy—she was childless, and lived, she and her husband, happily, surrounded with flowers, birds, and music. I had never seen this lady, but she knew of me through our Liberal papers, and her references assured me she was just as good and true as my heart told me she was. So I wrote her about Katy, and, after a good deal of unwinding of "red tape," she obtained the necessary documents that would place little Katy in her care. And when she came to take her, poor Katy cried, for she was about to be separated from her brother and sister, and she did not know the lady who was to take her away. But, in her new home, there was so much to take up her mind that she soon forgot her little troubles, and became a very happy girl. In that home she has remained ever since, until now she is sixteen years of age. I trust there are many years of usefulness before her. She has a broad and comprehensiv mind, free from bigotry and superstition, thanks to the pure and truthful influences with which her benefactors hav surrounded her. I would that all motherless girls might be so fortunate and fall into such careful and friendly hands as did my little friend Katy. ED.

Little Pearl;

Pearl is an intensely activ child, and generally manages to keep the family pretty wide awake. Her superabundant vitality keeps her on the move continually, and, of course, her little hands and feet often get her into trouble. but she is only three years old, so we readily forgiv her childish pranks. She often makes some sage remark, or utters some truism that sets us thinking. For instance, she was in a bad humor one day, and did so many naughty things that her mamma had to reprove her almost constantly. Every few minutes it was, "Pearl, do stop!" "Pearl, why don't you behave?" and, "Pearl, you must not do so, I say!" "I really don't know what to do with you, Pearl," and so on. At last, Pearl began to think about the oft-repeated admonitions, and, with a very grave face, she went to her mamma, and leaning over her lap she looked up into her mamma's eyes and soberly inquired, "Mamma, don't your 'ittle dirl ever do anyfing right!"

The question set mamma thinking, and she came to the conclusion that mammas sometimes fail in some points, as well as little folks; that they forget to praise and appreciate the "right" things, but seldom fail to blame all wrong-doings of the little ones, and hence their baby hearts get discouraged, as well as the bigger and stronger ones of grown-up people. E. L. HULL.

Hobart, Ind.

[What a sermon little Pearl preached! And what a text is that for everybo dy!—"Don't your little girl ever do anything right?" How many go through this world heartsick and faint for one encouraging word; perishing for a smile of appreciation, a look of love and tender good cheer. The slightest stepping aside or deviation from the right brings at once the smarting word of censure, the cutting sarcasm, the cold reproof that sinks like a sharp knife into the very heart of the sensitiv child, making a cruel wound that heals slowly and leaves a scar behind.

There are singing-birds of love and kindness in every heart. We only need open the door that they may fly to other hearts, and their melody will make the joy and blessing of many a toiler on the earth. So, while we remember to blame, let us not forget to praise, seeking for opportunities everywhere we can; and life will be richer for the helpful, cheerful words we utter. Kind words are health-lifts—lifts to happiness, hope, heaven. They need to be spoken everywhere—in the kitchen, the nursery, the parlor, the counting-room, the mill, upon the street, in all places, and at all times. The weary wife and mother takes a firmer, happier hold on life for the kind word and smile of the husband and father, and he, the husband and father, steps lighter as he goes out to win bread for the little ones, when he carries with him the kisses and blessings of wife and children. And the children are happier and lighter-hearted for the "well done" bestowed upon the good acts they try to perform. Their restless feet will tread the thorns soon enough; let them hav the roses while they may. Bridget in the kitchen, Patrick in the field, will do more work under words of cheer and encouragement than if continually fretted at and found fault with. Let us, then, be misers in words of censure, and spendthrifts in kindness and encouragement.

"Speak gently; it is better far
To rule by love than fear;
Speak gently, let not harsh words mar
The good we might do here."

Help Spread the Light.

It is acknowledged by all that the best way to spread Liberal principles is by papers, tracts, and books. Every issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good missionary document, and every Freethought book sold is a silent pleader and propagator of the truth. There are thousands of Freethinkers all over the country whom we do not know and who do not know this paper. But our friends know them, and we ask such as are willing to spend a few moments for the good of Liberalism to send us their names and addresses, that we may mail them copies of the paper. We are willing to furnish the copies necessary for this purpose and mail them, as we hope a few extra subscribers may thereby be obtained, which will make the pecuniary outlay square. But the main object is to spread the knowledge of Liberalism, its aims and objects, what we think and why we think it. We would like every one to know that the Christian faith is a rope of sand, that the churches are taking the money of the people without giving any return. It is the duty of all Freethinkers to let their neighbors know that the fires of hell hav been quenched.

Many Liberals say they hav no time to devote to missionary work, and do not like to argue with their church acquaintances. Very well, send us the names and let THE TRUTH SEEKER argue the case. Where a man is liberally inclined—and not dead to all sense and reason—we hope and think THE TRUTH SEEKER will bring him clear out of the fog.

To stimulate our friends in this work we make the following offer, only asking that when the sender has read the pamphlets he shall hand them around, that others may be benefited.

To everyone sending us the names and addresses of twenty-five independent men and women who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and who do their own thinking, we will send one copy of either of the below-named twenty-five-cent books:

Influence of Christianity upon Civilization, by B. F. Underwood.
Advancement of Science. The Inaugural Address of Prof. John Tyndall, delivered before the British Association for the Advancement of Science.
Chronicles of Simon Christianus. His manifold and wonderful adventures in the Land of Cosmos. A new scripture (evidently inspired) discovered by I. N. Fidel.
Religion not History. An able examination of the Morals and Theology of the New Testament. By Prof. F. W. Newman, of the London University.
The Besant-Hatchard Debate. A two nights' debate between Mrs. Annie Besant and Rev. A. Hatchard, on "Jesus of Nazareth a Historical Character, and the Influence of Christianity on the World."

Among the reforms THE TRUTH SEEKER aims to effect are:

Total separation of church and state, including the equitable taxation of church property; secularization of the public schools, abolition of Sunday laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Its sixteen large pages are filled every week with scientific, philosophic, and Freethought articles and communications by the ablest Freethinkers in the country. It givs all the Liberal news, and keeps its readers posted on current secular and theological events. It is the armory from which hundreds draw their weapons in contests with priesthood. All the Liberal papers are good, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is

THE BEST AND LARGEST.

It is conducted in a broad and truly liberal spirit, and givs everyone a hearing upon all subjects pertaining to the welfare of the human race.

OPINIONS REGARDING IT.

A paper like THE TRUTH SEEKER is something more and better than an advocate of truth. Through it its subscribers touch elbows with each other. Each reader knows that he is one of a goodly company who find comfort and inspiration in its pages. If they should meet each other they would feel like brothers and sisters. They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winsted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

HEALTH HINTS TO WOMEN

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR ALL.

THE DANISH CURE EXPLAINED

BY WILHELMINE D. SCHOTT,

Practitioner of the Danish Cure.

WITH PORTRAIT OF AUTHOR.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

The Labarum of Constantine.

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders; and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

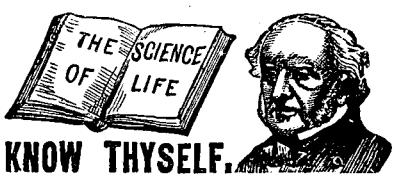
Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in out. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.



"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Gems of Thought.

LIFE is made up of breaths, of inhalations and exhalations, and while taking a breath any person can perform his duty, and not fall short in it; and what he could do while taking one breath he can do while taking a thousand.—D. M. Bennett.

THE stricter orthodox apologists always assume or imply that the rejection of their doctrin argues "an evil heart of unbelief," an unwillingness to submit to the authority of God and the strict requirements of his law; and they often attribute the embezzlements and defalcations of the time to the abounding skepticism of the age. If they were right in this, might we not expect to find the vast majority of defaulters and betrayers of public trusts outside the the church and among the skeptics and Liberals? But the fact is certainly far otherwise.—Springfield Republican.

THE religious man, who believes all events, mental as well as physical, are pre-ordained and arranged according to the decrees of infinit wisdom, and the philosopher who knows that, by the wise and eternal laws of the universe, cause and effect are indissolubly joined together, and that one follows the other in invariable succession—equally feel that this ordination, this chain, cannot be changeable at the cry of man. To suppose that it can is to place the whole harmonious system of nature at the mercy of the weak reason and the selfish wishes of humanity. If the purposes of God were not wise they would not be formed; if wise, they cannot be changed, for they would then become unwise. To suppose that an all-wise being would alter his designs and modes of proceeding at the entreaty of an unknowing creature, is to believe that compassion would change his wisdom into foolishness.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

MAN, amidst the fluctuations of his own feelings, and of passing events, ought to resemble the ship, which currents may carry and winds may impel from her course, but which, amidst every deviation, still presses onward to her port with unremitted perseverance. In the coolness of reflection he ought to survey his affairs with a dispassionate and comprehensiv eye, and, having fixed on his plan, take the necessary steps to accomplish it, regardless of the temporary mutations of his mind, the monotony of the same track, the apathy of exhausted attention, or the blandishments of new prospects.—Bailey's Essays on the Formation and Publication of Opinion. [A work that has now been thirty years before the public, and is allowed to rank with Milton's Areopagitica and Mill's Liberty.]

IN looking at our age, I am struck, immediately, with one commanding characteristic, and that is, the tendency in all its movements to expansion, to universality. This tendency is directly opposed to the spirit of exclusivness, restriction, narrowness, monopoly, which has prevailed in past ages. Human action is now freer, more unconfined. All goods, advantages, helps, are more open to all. The privileged, petted individual is becoming less, and the human race are becoming more. The multitude is rising from the dust. Once we heard of the few, now of the many; once of the prerogativs of a part, now of the rights of all. We are looking, as never before, through the disguises, envelopments of ranks and classes, to the common nature which is below them; and are beginning to learn that every being who partakes of it, has noble powers to cultivate, solemn duties to perform, inalienable rights to assert, and a vast destiny to accomplish.—Dr. Channing's Present Age.

THERE is a pretty passage in one of Lucian's Dialogs, where Jupiter complains to Cupid that though he has had so many intrigues, he was never sincerely beloved. "In order to be loved," says Cupid, "you must lay aside your ægis and your thunderbolts, and you must curl your hair, and place a garland on your head, and walk with a soft step, and assume a winning, obsequious deportment." "But," replied Jupiter, "I am not willing to resign so much of my dignity." "Then," returns Cupid, "leave off desiring to be loved." He wanted to be Jupiter and Adonis at the same time.—Mrs. Barbauld.

IT is sometimes urged that to deny the immortality of the soul is to reduce man to the level of the beast, but it is forgotten that mankind are not quite on a level. Take the savage with lower jaw projecting far in advance, and compare him with Dante, Shakspere, Milton, or Voltaire. Take the Papuan and Plato, the Esquimaux and Confucius, and then ask whether it is possible to contend that all human beings hav equal souls.—Has Man a Soul? by C. Bradlaugh.

NOWHERE (except in some monastic institutions) is diversity of taste entirely unrecognized; a person may, without blame, either like or dislike rowing, or smoking, or music, or athletic exercises, or chess, or cards, or study, because those who like each of these things, and those who dislike them, are too numerous to be put down. But the man, and still more the woman, who can be accused of doing "what nobody does," or of not doing "what everybody does," is the subject of as much depreciatory remark as if he or she had committed some grave moral delinquency.—Mill's Liberty.

THE academics always talk of doubt and suspense of judgment, of danger in hasty determination, of confining to very narrow bounds the inquiries of the understanding, and of renouncing all speculations which lie not within the limits of common life and practice. Nothing, therefore, can be more contrary than such a philosophy to the supine indolence of the mind, its rash arrogance, its lofty pretensions, and its superstitious credulity. Every passion is mortified by it, except the love of truth, and that passion never is, nor ever can be, carried to too high a degree. It is surprising, therefore, that this philosophy, which, in almost every instance, must be harmless and innocent, is what chiefly exposes it to the public hatred and resentment. By flattering no irregular passion, it gains few partisans; by opposing so many vices and follies, it raises to itself abundance of enemies, who stigmatize it as libertin, profane, and irreligious.—Hume's Essays.

Odds and Ends.

"NO, dear," said a Brooklyn school teacher to an inquiring youthful mind, "a little caterpillar is not a kittenpillar."

"I'M down to bed-rock," said a henpecked Pittsburgh husband, as he swayed the cradle containing his howling son and heir.

"I HOPE, sir, you will not proceed to extremities," said the lover at the gate as his sweetheart's furious old pa came striding down the walk in a pair of winter boots.

IN Salt Lake City the sidewalks are twenty feet wide. This, probably, is to permit a man's widows to walk abreast instead of in couples when going to his funeral.

"WHAT'S the worst thing about riches?" asked a Sunday-school teacher. "That they take unto themselvs wings and fly away," promptly replied the boy at the foot of the class.

"YES," said Farmer Furrow, after chasing a chicken clear around a ten-acre lot and clutching only a handful of feathers, "the only sure thing in this world is uncertainty."

"No, I won't hav a cat about my house," savagely exclaimed a young wife the other day. "Every time I look at a cat it makes me mad to think it can wear a fur coat in winter and I can't."

"DOES your mind never dwell upon the awful certainty of death?" asked the clergyman of Flattery. "Well, not very numerously," responded he; "it's the awful uncertainty of how to get a living that troubles me."

"WHAT is that—is it a circus acrobat?" "Oh, no, my son; that is a man who is kicking himself." "What makes the man kick himself?" "He has been to a masquerade party, and flirted with his wife all the evening."

"WHAT is a limited monarchy, Johnny?" "Well, my idea of a limited monarchy is where the ruler don't hav much to rule." "Giv an example." "An example? Lemme see! Well, if you was bossin' yourself, for instance."

"PLEASE, sir, giv a poor blind man a nickel," said a tramping beggar to a gentleman. "But you are not blind," remarked the gentleman. "No, but my partner is. He is standing down there on the corner to see if the policemen are coming."

"FATHER," said a bright lad, "I think I'll become a minister when I grow up." "What puts that idea in your head, my boy?" asked the astonished parent. "Because, dad, I notice that ma always kills a chicken whenever the minister eats here."

AN exchange tells of a Chicago young man who, in a rash moment, told his girl that if she would hang up her stocking on All-Hallow Eve he would fill it to the brim with something nice. When he saw her stocking he was undecided whether to get into it himself or buy her a sewing machine.

TOGETHER they were looking over the paper. "Oh, my, how funny," said she. "What is it?" he asked. "Why, here's an advertisment that says, 'No reasonable offer refused.'" "What's so odd about that?" "Nothing, nothing," she replied, trying to blush, "only those are my sentiments."

THERE are lots of good people in this world who think gambling an unpardonable sin, and who would never, never, never take a hand in a quiet game of eucher, or bet a cookie on a game of checkers, but who see nothing inconsistent in going into an insurance office and betting the insurance company $50 against $5,000 that they will not die nor their house burn down within a year.

"MY dear," inquired a lady of her spouse, "how can you expect to be thankful to-day when scarce a month has elapsed since my mother joined the saints in glory?" To this the man smilingly replied: "You should be thankful, dear wife, that your husband bears up with such fortitude under this bitter dispensation and recognizes in the removal of his mother-in-law the kindly hand of an all-wise Providence."

CHRISTIAN endeavor.—Visitor from the city: "You hav a delightful place here and a lovely little church. You must be perfectly happy." Country clergyman: "Ah, but you don't know how hard it is to make both ends meet on my meager stipend." Visitor: "But you hav extras, don't you? Wedding, and christenings—" Clergyman: "Of course, there are a few. But, do what I will, I cannot count upon more than four funerals a week."

A MAN who was selling polish or something of the sort entered the yard of a colored family on Illinois street and inquired of a boy who sat on the doorstep: "Bub, is your mammy home?" "Yes." The agent raised his hand to knock on the door, but it was opened, and the woman stuck her head out and exclaimed: "Go right away, sah—go right away! I heard you speakin' to de boy, an' I wants you to distinctly understan' dat de agent who doan' inquar' for de lady of de house doan' make no sale!"

THERE are men of brains who count their gains
By the million dollars or more;
Then buy and sell, and really do well
On the money of the poor.
They manage to get quite deep in debt
By various crooked ways;
And so we say that the man to-day
Is the honest man who pays.

When in the town he never sneaks down
Some alley or way-back street;
With head erect he will never deflect,
But boldly each man meet.
He counts the cost before he is lost
In debt's mysterious maze,
And he never buys in manner unwise,
But calls for his bill and pays.

There's a certain air of debonair
In the man who buys for cash;
He is not afraid of being betrayed
By a jack-shyster's dash.
What he says to you he will certainly do,
If it's cash or thirty days;
And when he goes out the clerk will shout,
Hurrah for the man who pays.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 10. No. 51. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY. | New York, Saturday, December 22, 1883. | 33 CLINTON PLACE. | $2.50 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

It is stated that in Mexico women are not allowed to attend funerals. The glorious privilege of being present at weddings, however, is magnanimously accorded them.

The new lord mayor of London declines to take out his state carriages and liveries on Sunday, because it would giv work to his servants, and he wishes them to hav a day of rest.

Just because the widow's mite was so highly praised, says a religious paper, there are lots of people who pride themselvs with never putting more than a penny into the contribution box.

An Oil City deacon, being late at church, asked, in the course of his prayer, that his tardiness might be forgiven, as he had been up the night before opening the finest lot of dry goods ever brought to town.

Michigan, by a wise provision of her state constitution, forbids not only the employment on salary of a regular chaplain of either house, but also prohibits praying or any form of religious services in either house.

In a prayer-meeting in Westfield, Mass., a brother arose and said: "I want to hear sung that beautiful hymn, 'Split Doors.'" A ripple of laughter was suppressed by a sister who struck up "Gates Ajar." "That's it! that's it!" the brother shouted, as he sat down to enjoy the melody.

The latest word from America's "finest female orator and great teacher," formerly known as Victoria Woodhull, is that she has been married for four years to Mr. John Biddulph Martin, a wealthy English banker, and that she is lost forever to the American platform, but will never cease to charm her select English circle of admiring friends. The man who contradicts this delightful story in this country, says the New York World, will run the risk of bodily harm.

The Sheffield Daily Telegraph givs the following story of a local Sunday-school. "Parsons sometimes get answers they don't expect, even from children. One of them was questioning a Sunday-school class about the parable of the good Samaritan who fell among thieves on the way from Jerusalem to Jericho. Bringing the story to a point, he asked, "Now, why did the priest and Levite pass by on the other side?" "I know," said the lad; "because the man was already robbed."

Col. "Bob" Ingersoll has, according to one of our city dailies, removed from the house in Lafayette Square, Washington, where he has resided for some years, to the house No. 1347 K street, next to Senator Sherman's, which he has purchased. Here he resides, with his wife and their two daughters, Miss Eva and Miss Maud. It is liberty hall—each one of the quartet eating, sleeping, reading, working, or walking when desirable. The colonel says that his children never did a wrong, never kept a secret from their parents, and never hav been refused a request. The walls of the colonel's house are hung with pictures of Voltaire, Paine, and Mohammed. In every nook and corner he has a pagan statue or a barbaric idol.

At the yearly meeting of Plymouth congregation, held on the 14th, Mr. Beecher spoke thus of his church: "My audience has come to be a strange one. I wish I could say that their places hav been filled; but I must confess that Plymouth church has become rather a spiritual hotel than a church. People come here to be filled and go away again without any thoughts of housekeeping. There is little church feeling in the congregation, though there is, of course, plenty of Christian feeling. There is a feeling that the old church is able to take care of itself, and that all that needs to be done the pulpit will do. The Friday-night meetings hav come to be simply lectures. There are only half a dozen brethren among us who are willing to arise and pray, and as to these it is probably the wish of all the others that they wouldn't."

A London clergyman who does not believe in offering to a bride "the alternativ of slavery or perjury," and who always omits that "wicked expression 'obey,'" from the marriage service, writes to the Pall Mall Gazette about a wedding in a neighboring church which was attended by an ominous incident. The bride being dumb when she should hav uttered the dreadful word, the bridegroom bade the clergyman continue; "for," said he, shaking his fist, "we'll settle that 'ere among ourselvs afterward."

A Southwark (London) bootmaker has sued the rector of St. Savior's church, in that borough, for $500 for services rendered during his election to the chaplaincy, and the disclosures made are remarkable. He packed the church on Sunday when his candidate preached, and kept people away when the other candidate preached. It says a great deal for the liberal views of the rector that this good electioneering agent was an Irish Catholic. If half the plaintiff says is true, St. Savior's ought to be without an incumbent.

When John Hall, the reverend, preaches
To his flock in gowns and breeches—
Sweet his words as sugared peaches—
What the lesson that he teaches
To the people everywhere?
Why, that gentle, tuneful horning
Better is than solemn warning—
Than the flesh of patrons thorning—
And, that thrift will follow fawning,
As the harvest seedtime e'er!
Parson, tell your congregation,
When you make your next oration,
There will be a dispensation
By the people of this nation,
Who accounts will sternly square,
In the by and by, when there
Will be "music in the air."
Mr. Hall!

—John Swinton's Paper.

The common objection among womankind to letting their ages be known is not shared by the ladies of Japan, who actually display the facts as to their age in the arrangement of their hair. Girls from nine to fifteen wear their hair interlaced with red crape, describing a half circle around the head, the forehead being left free, with a curl at each side. From fifteen to thirty the hair is dressed very high on the forehead, and put up at the back in the shape of a fan or butterfly, with interlacings of silver cord and a decoration of colored balls. Beyond thirty a woman twists her hair round a shell pin placed horizontally at the back of the head. Widows also designate themselvs, and whether or not they desire to marry again.

El Mahdi, the false prophet of the Soudan, in his boyhood was apprenticed to a boatman. Running away, he went to Khartoum and attended a free school. He made considerable progress in religious knowledge, but was backward in acquiring the arts of reading and writing. After being ordained a sheik or faki, he took up his abode in a cave on the White Nile, and by fasting, praying, and incense-burning, extended his fame far and wide. He became wealthy, collected disciples, and married several wives. In 1881 he announced that he was the Mahdi foretold by Mohammed; that he had a divine mission to reform Islam, to establish universal equality, a universal law, a universal religion, and a community of goods, and that all who did not believe in him should be destroyed. This is the origin of the movement which is now shaking the East to its foundations. El Mahdi is undoubtedly a man of great natural ability and tact, and is a born organizer of men.

"It doan' look 'zactly right," says Brother Gardner, "fur one man to hav a big brick house, an' anoder man a rough bo'd shanty; but 'long 'bout tax-time de man in de shanty kin sit on de fence an' chuckle over de luck dat he aint rich. It doan' look 'zactly right to see one man go pushin' an' swellin' an' crowdin' everybody else off de sidewalk to let de public know dat he am a king bee; but such men hab to carry de anxiety ob bein' in debt to de tailor, an' ob dodging de grocer, an' ob subscribin' twenty-five dollars to build a church without a hope of being able to pay ten cents on de dollar. In fack, my friends, dar am heaps an' heaps o' things dat doan' look 'zactly right to us at fust glance, but when we come to figger it up, an' divide an' subtract, we've all got a heap to be thankful fur an' to encourage us to git up airly in de mawnin'. A man kin brace his legs an' lay back like a mule, an' kick away at de hull world, an' hate everybody, an' be hated in return; or he kin pick up sartin crumbs ob consolashun, inter a seat in de back eand ob de wagon, an' take a heap ob comfort, knowin' dat somebody is wuss off 'n himself. Let us accumulate to bizness."

The revelations made in the New Utrecht, Long Island, matrimonial case throw a rather sad light on church sociables in that enlightened region. At one of these sociables of the Methodist church a gushing maid of eighteen went through the game of playing marriage with a roystering youngster of sixteen. The maid now comes into court and solemnly declares to the best of her knowledge and belief that it was serious and binding, which the youth of sixteen treats with scoffing, backed up by his irreverent parent, who still supports him. The interesting part of the affair lies in the evidence adduced on the trial, to which were brought wagon-loads of blushing damsels who had been in the habit of attending the church sociables. These waif witnesses tell how it was customary for all of them to sit in the hammock and be kissed by the boys at the Methodist church sociable. They seemed to think that a church sociable without a hammock and the hugging would be a tame affair. This appalling confession, made by the younger members of the society, who only average eighteen, leads to the most unfathomable surmises as to what the other members did who are over forty. If the social customs at a New Utrecht church gathering take this wide latitude in youth, to what limitless possibilities must they extend in maturity? If the boys and girls sat in the hammock and hugged and kissed, what were the deacons and matrons up to at the same time? While the girls and boys were marrying each other on the front piazza, were the fathers and mothers dancing the can can in the dining-room or abducting each other from the back steps?

A dispatch from Ottawa givs this account of the social amenities observed at a church fair held in Kingston: A disgraceful scene occurred at Kingston in connection with an election held under the auspices of St. Paul's church. The feature of the evening was a bazar. As the people of St. Mary's Cathedral had recently realized handsomely on voting as to which was the most popular representativ of the city in Parliament, Messrs. Gunn or Metcalf, the Anglican church ladies thought they could do well by setting up two local politicians. Dr. Sullivan was put up by the Conservativs and Mr. Harty by the Liberals. Voting during the day went along smoothly, but in the evening the political friends of the candidates assembled in force. As 10 o'clock approached the excitement increased, the vote standing, Harty, 1,917; Sullivan, 1,827. The Rev. Mr. Carey finally declared the polls closed. A leading Liberal passed around the booth to speak to the scrutineer, and, suspicious of his movements, the Sullivan party rushed upon the polling booth. In a moment there was a collapse and dreadful confusion. The pole which held aloft one side of a flag struck a lady upon the forehead, and she fainted. As she fell the official record of the vote was secured—Harty, 2,117; Sullivan, 1,962. During a scuffle Mr. Sullivan's friends got hold of the ballot-box and stuffed it, and claimed that their candidate was in the lead. The scene when the booth was knocked over and afterward was most exciting. The church pastor looked on pityingly but helplessly. He is now satisfied that politics should hav no place in church affairs. Capt. Gaskin, one of the most violent of local politicians, grabbed up a fancy chair which was to be given to the one having the highest number of votes, and carried it to Mr. Sullivan.

TEMPTATION OF CHRIST.

According to Christ's own declaration, he was present at the war in heaven.

"And there was war in heaven. Michael and his angels fought against the dragon; and the dragon fought and his angels. And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him" (Rev. xii, 7–9).

Christ said he saw Satan fall from heaven. "And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven" (Luke x, 18). And that he was thoroughly acquainted with his nature and character. "Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do; he was a murderer from the beginning and abode not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar and the father of it" (John viii, 44). And positivly declared that very speedily—during that generation (see Matt. xxiv, 30–34)—Satan would be cast into the everlasting fire prepared expressly for him. "Then shall he say also unto them on the left hand, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv, 41). And then shall the earth be restored to all its Eden purity and beauty (redeemed and purified by fire and brimstone), and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of Christ and his saints. "But the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. Nevertheless we according to his promis look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness" (2 Peter iii, 7, 13).

Possessed of this knowledge, how could there be the slightest temptation to Christ to yield to the silly offer of Satan? What inducement, to bow down and worship Satan, to obtain kingdoms so soon to be destroyed by fire and brimstone, and so speedily to be restored to Eden purity and become the kingdom of Christ and of his saints?

Is it "internal evidence" of divine inspiration and heavenly wisdom to inform us: "Again the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them?" (Matt. iv, 8).

The New Testament tells us Jesus saw Satan fall from heaven, Satan having so fallen. Both must hav know the world was round, and they could no more see all the kingdoms of the world from an exceeding high mountain than they could down in the valley. If Satan showed Christ all the kingdoms of the world from that high mountain, he performed a more wondrous miracle in doing so than any recorded of Christ. Or did Christ use supernatural vision especially to accommodate Satan and help tempt himself? Why did Christ permit Satan to take him up mountains, to place him on pinnacles? He had power to cast out devils at will; why did he not drive Satan from him, since even deaf and dumb devils heard, cried out, and obeyed him?

"When Jesus saw the people come running together, he rebuked the foul spirit, saying unto him, Thou dumb and deaf spirit, I charge thee, come out of him; and the spirit cried, and rent him sore, and came out of him" (Mark ix, 25, 26).

Matthew tells the same story, but according to his version the child was simply a lunatic. "Lord, hav mercy on my son, for he is a lunatic" (Matt. xvii, 15).

In those days the insane were regarded as being possessed by devils and most barbarously and cruelly treated. But how could the son of God, the co-creator of the world, be so ignorant? or, knowing better, why did not the gentle, pitying savior declare the truth and save much of cruel torture and misery to the afflicted? Why did Jesus encourage the wicked and cruel error?

Reader, pause and think over the internal evidence quoted. Would any intelligent, sane Christian believe such stories if found in any other book? Where, oh! where is the holy spirit to lead us to that internal evidence that will convince all honest hearts of the truth and divine inspiration of the holy New Testament?

Christ declared the kingdom of heaven was very soon to be established. "From that time Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand" (Matt. iv, 17). This declaration is claimed to hav been made by Christ over 1800 years ago. Christ again and again positivly declares he would soon reappear in all the glory of his father, surrounded by hosts of angels, and inaugurate his kingdom.

The reason he urges repentance at the very commencement of his ministry is because the kingdom of heaven is at hand. When he sends out his disciples to preach, he tells them: "But when they persecute you in this city, ye flee into another; for verily I say unto you, Ye shall not hav gone over the cities of Israel, till the son of man be come" (Matt. x, 23). Again he declares: "For the son of man shall come in the glory of his father with his angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xvi, 27, 28).

What need to multiply texts? Is it possible for assertions to be more explicit, more positiv? Were they fulfilled? Never.

If we are to believe the internal evidence of the New Testament, the son of God prophesied falsely. Perhaps this was as Matthew so often declares—that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets:

"And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the Lord has spoken? When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously; thou shalt not be afraid of him" (Deut. xviii, 21, 22).

"I hav not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I hav not spoken to them, yet they prophesied" (Jer. xxiii, 21). We make no assertions; we prove Bible by Bible, giv the chapters and verses, and request the reader to turn to the Bible and read the context. We hav taken pains to quote carefully and correctly, and the result is before you. It condemns Christ as a false prophet.

Some of the learned doctors of divinity (realizing how very weak are the claims of the divine perfections of Christ and his teachings) tell us the declaration of Christ—"Verily, verily, I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom"—met its fulfilment at the Transfiguration; when Peter, James, and John were taken into the mountain Christ was glorified, and Moses and Elias appeared with him; Elias representing the saints who shall be translated at Christ's coming, and Moses the dead saints who shall be resurrected. This is all imaginary. The New Testament does not tell us so, or even intimate anything of the kind. In regard to the Transfiguration we read: "And was transfigured before him; and his face did shine as the sun, and his raiment was white as the light. And behold there appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him" (Matt. xvii, 2, 3).

It is alleged that Christ was glorified (as we read in the legends of Christna, the god of Buddhism, 2,000 years before Christ—Christna appeared to a few of his disciples in all the glory of his father, Vishnu, and his disciples were amazed and fell at his feet," etc.). But Christ said he would "come in the glory of his father." The record reads: "And after six days Jesus taketh Peter, James, and John his brother, and bringeth them up into a high mountain apart." In no sense can it be claimed he came or that his angels were with him. Moses and Elias can hardly be called "his angels." We admit it is now quite customary among Christians to speak of their dead as being angels in heaven. But this is contrary to Christ's teaching. He said: "For when they shall rise from the dead, they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels which are in heaven" (Mark xii, 25).

This vision—for such Christ declared the Transfiguration to hav been (Matt. xvii, 9)—does not meet the most important part of Christ's promis. "And then he shall reward every man according to his works. Verily I say unto you, There be some standing here which shall not taste of death till they see the son of man coming in his kingdom" (Matt. xvi, 27, 28). And this is in exact harmony with his subsequent declaration, describing his coming in Matt. xxiv: "And then shall appear the sign of the son of man in heaven; and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory. And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet; and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other. Now learn a parable of the fig-tree; when his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh; so likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors. Verily I say unto you, This generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away" (Matt. xxiv, 30–35).

Did the son of man reward every man according to his works at the Transfiguration? Did the son of man come in the glory of his father, with his angels, before the death of those to whom he made the promis? Has the generation he referred to — to whom he said, "So likewise ye, when ye shall see all these things"—passed away? Did Christ come and gather all his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other, before that generation passed away?

This is the "internal evidence," dear Christian friends. If the writers were inspired of God, would they make such assertions? If Christ had been the son of God, would he hav made such false declarations?

"Either there is no historical basis to be found anywhere in the gospels, or Jesus expected promptly to reappear enthroned on the clouds of heaven, in order to inaugurate the kingdom of the Messiah as foretold by him. Now, if he was the son of God, or otherwise a being of supernatural dignity, all we hav to say is, that the event did not occur, and that therefore he who predicted it could not hav been a deity" (Strauss, Old Faith and New, pp. 91, 92).

Every incident recorded in the New Testament of the life of Christ, every prophecy he made, on simply comparing scripture with scripture, dethrones our idol, and shows us a man frail and fallible as ourselvs.

We shall next examin the "internal evidence" of the New Testament in regard to the reward of saints and punishment of sinners. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Rochester, N. Y.

What is Sin?

In a former article I expressed the opinion that it needed but an altered view of human responsibility to upset the Christian doctrin of sin and atonement, and of reward and punishment. The professors of Christianity are unfortunate in that their theology itself is as much a monstrosity as the pretended authority on which it rests. I propose, now, as briefly as possible, to review the difficulties in the way of reconciling the Christian idea with a rational estimate of man's nature.

Viewing nature as a whole, it is well known that all effects hav their causes. We do not, however, get the full sense of this truth by looking simply at the immediate causes, they being dependent on other causes reaching back an infinit length, and ramifying in an infinit number of directions. All natural phenomena may be viewed as results which all manner of causes going before hav had their share in producing; and as we know that these causes must absolutely determin the effects, it follows that all phenomena are necessary results. The element of chance is totally eliminated from nature; her method is exact—unerring. If a ball could be thrown into the air a hundred times in succession, under precisely the same circumstances, it would always rise to the same height, fall in the same time, and roll on the ground in the same direction. Every wave of the sea, and every atom of foam on its crest, has its course bounded and defined, and the faint cirrus that stretches its filmy thread across the sky is as full of purpose as the hills.

The facts stated are incontrovertible, and no one will take the trouble to dispute them; it is but a step further to ask if man himself conforms or is an exception to this general order of things.

There are two distinct theories on this point, that of "liberty" and that of "necessity," each having its supporters. Those who argue for liberty claim that man has an independent power of willing and of determing his acts, which makes him a responsible being; that, independent of all influences and surroundings, there is an "I, myself," which originates ideas; forms, plans, and directs conduct. This royal attribute of man is claimed principally on the ground that men hav a natural conviction or belief that they are acting freely. "I claim for the mind," says Dr. McCosh, "a power to choose, and when it chooses, a consciousness that it might choose otherwise. This truth is revealed to us by immediate consciousness, and is not to be set aside by any other truth whatever." The opponents of this theory, while admitting a consciousness of freedom, believe it to be a deception. According to their doctrin of necessity, man's will is not independent, but governed by motivs arising out of his circumstances; that these motivs operate like physical causes, and that the will must always obey the strongest.

Without entering into the merits of the two theories, I submit a proposition, of the truth of which I hav not the slightest doubt: That a man's every thought, word, and deed is a necessary consequence. It matters not whether his motivs and consequent acts be hereditary, educational, circumstantial, or whether they spring from himself as their independent generating principle, they are equally necessary. Nothing can exceed the intensity of my conviction of the fundamental necessity of all the processes of nature, whatever their tendency, whether in man or in the external world. To me the existence of a result is proof of its necessity. It is nature's working out of a problem on her own slate. Man's thoughts and acts are the direct product of all the forces acting within and around him, and it is obvious that the operation of a certain set of causes must hav one definit result, without the possibility of any alternativ. This view is strongly supported by the argument I quoted recently from Dr. Priestley, that though a person may reproach himself for past conduct, were the occasion repeated under the exact circumstances, no subsequent experience being admitted, he would do precisely the same again, and always, showing the existence of a law regulating conduct according to motiv, as inflexible as that which confines a moving body to a certain course, dependent on the force of propulsion, gravitation, etc. Inherited disposition and temperament; education, habit, experience; the exigencies of the hour, alike hav their effect in determining feeling and conduct; every thought and impulse is generated by some influence, every act is a following of the strongest motiv. In all that man does, whether sagacious and beneficent, or erring and frivolous, or malevolent and destructiv, he is obeying the law of his being, even as every other atom of the universe owns its law. Through all the struggling vagaries of life, through solemn purpose, through truth and falsehood, through ambition, hope, despair, cruelty, love, and hate, man puts forth his growth even as a tree—mean of its kind, stunted by rigor, with gnarled trunk and blighted, jagged branch, or rising in graceful lines, a pleasant object for the eye, a noontide shade for flocks, a shelter from storms. Further, I believe that the same force, the same law, being prevalent everywhere, whether among rocks and glaciers, or sublimated in the human mind, could this vast machine, the world, be set back as a clock to the hour whence it originally started, so accurate is the mechanism, so necessary every movement, the same lapse of time would bring about the recurrence of every animate and inanimate form, every face and every feature, every act and every word, every passion and every thought.

Christian theology was formulated in the absence of all the considerations I hav named; but the preceding view of creation must, I think, be conceded to be far more dignified and more worthy of a creator than any that we derive from the Bible. There we find man first in a state inconceivable in the light of our present knowledge. Dr. William Smith, editor of the well-known "Dictionary of the Bible," a fair authority for the average theological interpretation of scripture, remarks in his "Old Testament History:" "We may believe with South, that 'Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens the rudiments of Paradise.'" How man fell from this high state the reader may learn by consulting the interesting Mosaic account, which cannot be seriously discussed here.

The rude and primitiv character of the Christian system—an unnatural grafting of the mild but sometimes infatuated teachings of the carpenter's son on the stern old theology of the Hebrews—is shown in all its doctrins.

It requires the clumsy mechanical device of a tempter, inciting man to an act whence resulted the downfall of the race and the defeat of the ostensible purpose of creation; it teaches the constant activity of the evil principle, prompting men to further sin, and exhibits a creator tolerating a successful rival and opponent in his own universe.

It makes sin to lie in man's presumption to disobey a command rather than in the nature and effects of the act he commits. Thus, it is a sin to eat of a certain fruit or flesh, or to work on a certain day, alike as to commit robbery or theft; while we find occasionally the greatest atrocities—as the Canaanitic raids of the Hebrews—or the most contemptible meanness—as the pettifogging trickery of Jacob—sanctioned or connived at by the Almighty, without any regard to their intrinsic wickedness.

Ignoring the conditions of man's nature, and all predisposing causes, it pronounces on the miserable, helpless sinner a sentence that, neither remedial nor castigatory, is a mere nightmare of purposeless hate, a monstrum horrendum of unutterable atrocity. Lastly, it furnishes a way of escape from this doom by an act on the part of deity itself, incredible and inexplicable by all the arts of sophistry.

Compare with this lurid conception the simple theory put forth in the preceding sketch. We can not affirm that man and nature are perfect; but with regard to the former, it will be well to estimate his acts according to their merits, without reference to any command. The "divine" ordinances may be in most cases on the side of virtue, but it is obvious that such laws did not create the distinction between good and evil; they merely recorded what existed before. Therefore we may eliminate the command altogether, and regard human acts simply in the light of their nature and consequences.

I hav claimed that every thought and act is necessary, and every man resistlessly impelled to it. In this view, therefore, there can be no sin in the biblical sense of the word, nor any righteousness. "If the things which move the will are not in our power," says Cicero, "then neither our actions nor our volitions are free—then there is no room for praise or blame, for reward or punishment." It is bootless to argue against evil and disaster, as inconsistent with the will of a benign creator; these things exist, an argument unanswerable. They seem to be a necessity in a world that was once a morass of wallowing saurians, rending each other with a ferocity to which living nature affords no parallel. The horrors of war, the daily wholesale tragedy of the slaughter-house, the strife of competition among men, teach us too forcefully the sternness of life beneath all the thin veneer of sentiment. We can only say such is the constitution of nature, and abide it. We may hav our faiths that, further on, the world will reach a higher plane. We hav outgrown in human history much barbarism, much oppression, much ignorance, and the course is still upward, but nature's processes are slow.

But, it will be said, this doctrin provides a wholesale license for crime and vice of all kinds, if men are really not responsible. Not so. The world has progressed so far that, in all civilized countries at least, a standard has been set up of things good and bad—those that tend to individual and public well-being, and those that tend to disintegration. The good must be encouraged, the evil repressed. The would-be murderer, the thief, whose better nature is not strong enough to prevail over his evil elements, must be supplied with the additional motiv of the fear of punishment; the actual transgressor must hav his career cut short in the interest of society; meanwhile society is capable of amelioration at the roots, by wholesome education, and all that promotes physical and mental sanity.

What, then, is sin? It is not the mere transgression of a command. It is not a disease, ushered into the world a few thousand years ago. It is not an accident. It is as old as goodness; nay, probably older, for the first human activities, no doubt, took largely the form of violence. It is not specific; we cannot say always, This is virtue, that, vice. If we judge by the motiv, we find practically good deeds from wrong impulses, and acts of wrong from honest but mistaken promptings. If we judge by the effect, we find mere goodness and benevolence not always doing the most good, especially where strong measures are needed. In men of strong and beneficent lives—the Luthers and Cromwells—the ingredients of character are not wholly angelic. What, then, is sin? Is it more than the unrefined force of nature, the relic of the brute from which we hav emerged? One of the great lizards of geology I find described in a handbook as follows: "Its strength was herculean, its fierceness indomitable, its voracity insatiable, and its faculties enabled it to wage most deadly war with its contemporaries;" and since it laid its eggs to quicken in the sun, I suppose it was animated by almost pure selfishness. It was only later that the mammalia appeared, that the mother-instinct began, and there dawned upon savage life the self-denying love that has gradually spread out into the allied sentiments of devotion and generosity, so touching in the dog, so conspicuous higher up, in the shining examples among mankind. Yet, following all the way up to man, mitigated but not subdued, the fierce force, the cunning, the selfishness of the primeval brute remain, and are, I take it, sin shorn of its theology. Is sin an element that any conceivable amount of progress will eliminate?

ROUNDHEAD.

Fruits of Land Robbery.

In a former article on land thieves, I stated that Congress had given one hundred and eighty millions of acres of the land stolen from the people—who need it to raise food on, and who hav the same right to it, without money or price, as to life itself, or to sunlight, air, or water—to the various railroads; and now we are told by the papers that one railroad company has stretched a three-ply-barbed-wire fence along the side of their land, forty miles, and emigrants and others hav to travel round it. If a company of emigrants or other travelers come to the middle of this fence, they hav to travel twenty miles to get round the end of it, and then travel back twenty miles, making forty miles of travel to get ahead less than one inch on their journey! This is a mere hint at what the most useful class of people will hav to suffer when all these 180,000,000 acres of land, lying in different tracts, are fenced.

Though every young man, when he becomes of legal age to act for himself, has a natural birthright to enough of the land to raise his food from, he is robbed of that right by our robbei-ment, falsely called government; turned into the highway, and has his head taxed, and if he has no father able to support him he must go into the labor market, which is overstocked with landless men struggling to obtain bread for themselvs and hungry families, and underbid them to gain employment; and if he fails in obtaining it, he must starve, become a tramp, steal, or rob, and then the hard-toiling, landless people must pay more taxes to support courts and prisons to punish him for the crime that our robberment has forced him to commit.

If he plants a hill of corn anywhere on this broad land, or picks up an armful of sticks to warm his shivering body, he is liable to be fined or imprisoned for trespass by some rich landowner, railroad or shylock company, all of whom get their luxurious living and coin money out of the sinews and life-blood of the toiling, homeless men whom they hav robbed of their right to land.

This land robbery has driven millions, who would hav been glad to be farmers if they had not been robbed of land, into the cities and manufacturing towns, until labor has become a drug in the market and laborers are forced to underbid each other and work at starvation wages. What means all this outcry of wrong and outrage over in Ireland? It means that English lords—or more properly devils—own the land in Ireland, and that the best of everything raised there must go to England to pay the rents for land, leaving nothing in Ireland but potatoes, and when that crop fails from drouth or rot, the people starve.

I remember some thirty to forty years ago, when the potato rot appeared, thousands of the Irish people lay down and starved; some died of starvation in their houses, some in the streets. I recollect that I sent them $10 from my little store, and I am now suffering myself for want of that $10. Thousands and tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of dollars in money and food were sent to Ireland at that time, which ought to hav been distributed among the widows, orphans, cripples, and aged and infirm people here at home. And all this charity was made necessary by the same system of land robbery that is now bringing the people of this nation into the same wretched condition.

My Shaker friends—the only religious society that did not turn against me sixty years ago, when I publicly declared that the Protestant churches were the harlots that the church of Rome was the mother of—sent Ireland two hundred barrels of flour at that time. So you see that land robbery in Ireland has had a baneful effect on this country as well as that. Nor is this all; but every year British steamers pour out thousands of the rakings and scrapings of Irish pauper-houses, penitentiaries, and prisons, the very worst classes of her citizens, thieves, murderers, and prostitutes, on our shores, all of them made what they are by land robbery.

These things, my friends, are all the terrible results of the same system that our robberment at Washington is now practicing in regard to the people's land. And, though what I hav said is but a mere hint at the evils of land robbery, if they do not arouse you to action, to secure to yourselvs and your children your rights to land, the thunders of heaven would not awaken you.

What mean all the numerous strikes among landless laborers in every part of our broad land? They mean that the people hav been robbed of their birthright to the soil; aye, they mean a great deal more; they mean and teach the wise and thoughtful that the houses of rich, idle land-sharks, their stores, their factories, their railroad stations—and Washington itself—will be blown up by glycerin or dynamite at no distant day, unless there is a change in this matter, for the American people will not always consent to be slaves; but when the law robs instead of protecting them, they will arise and take the power into their own hands, and then woe to the land thieves. The rich men and office-holders of this nation are slumbering over a volcano of wrath, and do not know it. They see the signs of it in the strikes, in the number of tramps, and in the number of homeless men struggling to pay rents and keep their families from starving, and in many other things, but are too busy in grinding the faces of the poor and accumulating riches, to understand what these signs mean, and the volcano will probably burst upon them while they are asleep, dreaming of their ill-gotten gains.

Was George Eliot Unhappy with Mr. Lewes?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. E. C. Towne, in a recent letter to the Boston Transcript, alleges that the late George Eliot was very unhappy in her marriage to Mr. G. H. Lewes. In support of this allegation, the writers says, he has "the authority of a lady of the highest character who lived in Lewes's family at the time that his first marriage was made 'unhappy.'" And the only other evidence adduced is a quotation from her writings about the mistake a woman may make in matrimony.

If the anonymous lady who told Mr. Towne that George Eliot was unhappy had lived in the family of Mr. Lewes during his second marriage, her testimony might hav some weight, but as she did not, it goes for nothing. Nor is there anything in the passage quoted by Mr. Towne to confirm the allegation. Any novel writer might utter the same sentiment.

It seems to me, therefore, that Mr. Towne is propagating an unnecessary scandal without adequate proof. He should remember the reception of Mrs. Stowe's scandal about Lord Byron.

Is not this propagator or "allegator" the Reverend E. C. Towne, who began as an orthodox preacher, then became a radical Unitarian or a Free Religionist, and lastly returned to his first estate and became an orthodox preacher in England? Is he not the Towne who once uttered sentiments concerning Jesus Christ that were extremly shocking? Is he not the Towne who, at a time when the settled pastors of Free Religion could be counted on the fingers of one hand, taunted the Spiritualists with having "a cheap and vagrant ministry?" Is he not the Towne who was for a little while literary editor of the Chicago Times, and who, after reviewing the book claiming that Paine was Junius, at once entered a copyright of an unwritten book essaying to prove that Paine and Franklin wrote the Junius Letters? QUERIST.

The Liberal Club.

A large and fine audience greeted Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., at the 218th meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club last Friday night. The hall was filled to the extent of its seating capacity, and rather more. Many fashionably dressed people were present, besides numerous young and beautiful girls. Mr. King, a man of extraordinary personal attractivness, sat near the door at one end of the hall, and at the other end the presiding officer, reclining gracefully in his chair, with the gaslight shining upon his genial features, presented a picture scarcely less impressiv than a sunset on Mt. Etna. The secretary's spectacles flashed back the light in many-colored rays, and the clink of silver as one intelligent person after another purchased THE TRUTH SEEKER was mingled with whispered inquiries as to when "The Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac" would be ready for the public. All was sweetness and light. In this framework of beauty Dr. Foote, tall and commanding in presence, with a kindly face and a pleasing voice, furnished an appropriate central figure.

Dr. Foote's lecture related to the subject of divorce. It was called out by the activity of the National Divorce Reform Association, and by the recent utterances of Mgr. Capel. Capel had claimed, the speaker said, that the Catholic church had always been the conservator of morals, the guardian of chastity, and had been the means of placing woman in her true position. This statement the doctor refuted by reading the testimony of history to the effect that from the inception of Christianity to the time of the Reformation the state of the morals of the people continued to grow worse and worse under the rule of the Catholic church. He pointed out that where there was the most religion there was the most immorality. In Massachusetts, where divorce laws are the most stringent, there were more crimes against chastity in proportion to other crimes than in states where the law is less strict. Dr. Foote has a scheme of his own for regulating marriage and reproduction. He would hav a commission appointed to examin scientifically the qualifications and mutual adaptability of candidates for marriage, and permit only those to marry each other who were declared by this commission to be natural mates. No offspring should occur when the man was under thirty and the woman under twenty-five years of age, unless the parents were licensed to bring about such an event. He advocated early marriage to avoid unnatural vice, and warned his audience against those evil practices into which the young and single are liable to fall. Dr. Foote remarked that he would like to talk more plainly upon this subject, but it was evidently very gratifying to many present that he did not. The address was well received, and contained much wholesome advice.

Dr. Weeks stated that he was very much in agreement with the speaker. People were inclined to marry regardless of temperamental law, and consequently their offspring were not the result of the best endeavor of which they were capable. Dr. Weeks talks learnedly and interestingly upon this topic.

Dr. Eccles occupied a position exactly antipodal to that of Dr. Foote. He did not favor boys and girls marrying at a tender age and devoting ten or fifteen years to experimental purposes. It would grow monotonous, and the young people would lose their interest in those departments of their anatomy which formed the distinguishing features between them. Long familiarity bred a lack of the necessary enthusiasm, etc., etc. [The foregoing etcetera, etceteras take the place of the portion of Dr. Eccles's remarks which were outside the reporter's function, and which, for that reason, he forbears to transcribe.]

Dr. Kinget, who followed, was absolutely unreportable from the ordinary point of view. Though inoffensiv, if not insignificant, in personal appearance, he is capable of making the most offensiv and unnecessary allusions to matters which it is generally thought should be confined to the physician and the patient. As Dr. Kinget livs by speculating in the ills which hav their rise near the nether terminus of the human vertebræ, it is only natural that he should carry his shop with him on this occasion. He was hissed on leaving the platform.

Mr. Andrews said that it seemed like going back twenty-five or thirty years to discuss this subject. The lecture had been a powerful presentation of the whole question. It had been complained that the more intelligent citizens had fewer children and left it to the less enlightened to populate the earth. He believed that the more and less intelligent should commingle. Perhaps, said he, Queen Victoria has been trying something of that kind with the gillie John Brown, but circumstances were against a full fruition of the scheme. Mr. Andrews added that the social question was the one supreme question, and all reforms were indirectly aimed at it. Morality was a question of geography, and had no universal standard. In New York a man might hav twenty wives, provided he was married to none of them, and a woman might hav an equal number of husbands under the same conditions, without violating the law. In Massachusetts this would be a crime.

Dr. Lambert remarked that brown-eyed women should not marry blue-eyed or gray-eyed men. They would find them inadequate. This was shown by observations in divorce courts, where brown-eyed women were found to predominate.

Dr. Foote closed the interesting debate by further elaborating his views on some of the points raised, and by replying to such of the speakers as had criticised his lecture adversely. Mr. Shook, who, in the capacity of attorney, has just distinguished himself by reclaiming to its mother an infant whom an unnatural sire had stolen from the maternal arms, was not present. Otherwise the amount of information on the matter of divorce from a legal and theological point of view might hav been materially augmented. This gentleman's conduct in thus continuing to absent himself from the meetings of the club is contemplated with much regret by the members.

Dr. Foote's Lecture.

Dr. Foote's lecture on "Divorce" before the Liberal Club was brave and admirable. It treated a great subject in a dignified, delicate, and masterly manner. There was no shrinking from facts, but the facts were presented with the noble frankness of science. It must be admitted that marriage is preeminently a scientific question. It has been too long shrouded in sentiment and romance, as well as in the false divinity of the church. Only in the light of reason and experience, guided by impartial logic, can the true relations of man and woman be settled. They are the most important of all relations, and they cannot be adjusted in any hap-hazard way. Love should not be blind, but wise with all that human knowledge and foresight can giv; otherwise there will be incalculable misery.

Dr. Foote's facts and arguments were advanced with great clearness and force. His lecture was in every way a success, both in matter and delivery. It was a presentation of the truth by a genuin student and thinker. It was profound and many-sided in its illustrations and explanations. Such a lecture should be published in order that one may see the full bearing of its courageous reasoning, and I hope this will be done. I can only touch upon a few points in this brief notice, hoping thereby to arouse curiosity for the whole discourse.

Hitherto it has been quite easy to get into marriage, but infinitly difficult to get out. Assuredly if such a bond is necessary for the order of society, it should not be quite so handy for the young and inexperienced to take upon themselvs its cares and burdens; while at the same time if they hav made a blunder, the way of escape is hedged in like the divinity of the king himself. Marriage is held to be so sacred an affair that human legislation can hardly deal with it at all. It must let the lovers obey the impulse of their souls and be married by the first priest they find, but when once in the awful folds of matrimony it is no longer a mere contract but a "divine institution" with which one is entangled, and the state is feeble as against the dictates of the church, which declares that this institution is founded by God, and is under its especial protection. Surely if marriage is to be indissoluble, there should be some wise and careful way by which this tremendous undertaking can be entered upon with more hopes of success, so that now and then, at least, some perfect unions may be established. As Judge Barrett makes the point—if, in relation to divorce, marriage is considered a sacrament, so, in relation to its original bond, it should be also so considered, and therefore the way into marriage should be made as difficult as the way out. There can be no double treatment of this matter. Marriage is a sacrament wholly, or it is simply and solely a contract.

Here is the battle-ground so far as legislation is concerned. To consider marriage a sacrament is simply a superstition. It is the conception of a barbarous theology. It is not a "divine institution," for the simple reason that the church itself is not "divine." Marriage exists for human happiness and for the order of society. It should be considered in no other light. All legislation should be based upon the idea of marriage as a contract, to be made and unmade in the same way that all contracts are. As a contract it should be sacredly maintained, but not otherwise. It is simply barbarous and inhuman to assert that the continuation of an unhappy marriage is necessary to the order of society. It is nothing but a curse, and to maintain it is to maintain a disease in the very heart of the community. Only happy marriages can be of any moral or political value, and such marriages have within themselves the permanence of their life. To compel a man and woman, who are unadapted to each other, to liv together in the marriage relation, is the greatest of tyrannies. It is the most cruel torture that can be inflicted on any being, and to insist upon such suffering is, to my mind, the most degrading survival of the savagery of the past. Let people fulfil their contracts, but beyond that let there be the utmost freedom.

Freedom will not destroy marriage but preserve its essential life. In the atmosphere of liberty there will still be duty, obligation, devotion, and love. All the nobilities of manhood and womanhood will still exist, and the best, the purest, and the most permanent relations will be established.

As Dr. Foote says, to make marriage free will not destroy the home and family; for the home and family in their true beauty and worth cannot be maintained by human legislation. They must be founded in affection, good-will, reason, and liberty. Where man and woman voluntarily live together, there will be the sweetest home and all the influences that make it elevating and delightful; but no compulsion can make a home—it can only make a jail.

Dr. Foote also shows that freedom will not foster the libertin, but make it impossible for such a selfish monster to exist. It is the slavery of marriage that creates those vices, those weaknesses, and those opportunities whereby the libertin thrives and gratifies his cruel lust. In the atmosphere of liberty he would be swept away, for liberty develops the generosities, the refinements, and the nobilities of human nature. It makes passion more beautiful, and duty more imperativ, for it then shines with the inward light of one's own soul. In liberty love becomes crowned with purity, for in liberty its noblest sacrifice is made available.

In these, and many other points, Dr. Foote showed how the application of liberty and science to marriage will enlarge and ennoble its function. This great subject must receive all the light that human knowledge can throw upon it. It must be most thoroughly discussed. It must be founded in affection, and must be the constant expression of affection. It must make its own law. It must be unloosed from the barbarism of the past and become a harmonious agreement, and not a terrible enslavement. Such scholarly and scientific lectures as this of Dr. Foote will be of immense service to a just and manly understanding of the question. It is not to destroy marriage, but to ennoble, to dignify, to glorify it, that we plead for perfect liberty. With liberty, all that is most heroic, tender, and beautiful in man and woman will come into crowning excellence in this crowning relation of human life.

Criticism and Questions.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I appreciate your remarks below my article, "Two Extremes." I may be "down on the wrong side of the fence," but I do not so see it; but sufficient proof will make the necessary change. I freely admit I am on the opposit side from yourself and very many of the Liberal family. You say my "assertion and belief prove nothing." True. "The supreme religious questions are: 1. Is there a God? And 2. If there is, did he hav anything to do with preparing the different Bibles now existing?" Health favoring, in the near future I will endeavor to take up these two propositions. "These questions must be proved outside of all Bibles." Not necessarily, for the matter of fact and truth contained in the book may be such that, in the nature of things, it may be valued evidence in its own behalf. "No half way; there is a God or there is not." Admitted. "The Bible is a divine work or not." Not necessarily; it may be part divine and part human, for many books contain both truth and error. "The truth cannot possibly lie between these extremes." The Bible being all divine or all human are the extremes; yet I can conceive of it being both human and divine, from its own testimony. "The preponderance of evidence is overwhelming against the Bible." Abstract statement, in the absence of proof, "proves nothing." "We know the story of creation, found in the Bible, is a lie." May not the "lie" arise from misunderstanding the Bible? for surely the understanding or misunderstanding, as it may be, necessarily becomes the standard by which such a proposition is understood. "Mr. Kirby believes it [creation as found in the Bible] to be a fact." I only believe the fact as I understand it. Yourself, Mr. Editor, and I may differ in our conclusions drawn from the language by which the fact of creation is set forth in the Bible.

But, Mr. Editor, I must apologize for lack of time at this writing to take up the main subject suggested. Nevertheless, I shall feel free to giv a reason for the hope I entertain on these subjects soon.

I am very much of a stranger with my Liberal brethren, and do not know that haste would be the part of wisdom on my part. I hav received very favorable impressions from the limited association with the Liberals of northeast Kansas; but yet it might be for want of a more general acquaintance with them. I might strike the wrong key at the wrong time and by so doing injure a good cause.

If I understand Liberalism, it is not Materialism, Spiritualism, Bibleism, or anti-Bibleism, but Investigationism; and any or all of these views may be held and discussed in candor and kindness on the Liberal platform. This being the case, count me a weak Christian brother on the Liberal platform; and as such, please deal tenderly with me until I gain strength to bear strong meat.

I love investigation when it is conducted in kindness and fairness. From what I hav seen and read, so far as it relates to the Bible, nearly all Liberals disbelieve and reject the Bible. There appears to be only on e side, and on account of this fact, I can but think many hav run to an extreme; hav become reckless in statement and quotation. I could wish, on account of this, that a host of Liberal, earnest, intelligent, candid Christians would take their stand upon this platform, and I doubt not but they would make things profitable for the spirit of the age. I am utterly astonished that so many public advocates of the Christian religion (who claim the abillty and to hav the truth on their side) do not take their stand fair and bold on this offered platform, and meet the issue as noble men should; that by so doing there might be victory for truth and fact. But, 'tis too true, "gold makes soldiers fight the fiercer, and without it preaching would be scarcer." Most of preachers follow after the loves, and are blinded by an unconscious selfishness to truth in this life, and its consequences in the world to come.

I will close this contribution by asking a few questions.

1. Will Elliott Preston giv chapter and verse in the Old or New Testament for the italicized term, "nothing," as found in the article above his name in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Vol. X., No. 47, p. 738? "An omnipotent God creates, i. e., makes from nothing, one world and one man."

2. Will Wm. H. Rowan giv Bible proof of Matthew "saying it was at night the chief priests bound Jesus and brought him before Pilate," as found in his article, "The Trial of Jesus," in THE TRUTH SEEKER, Vol. X., No. 47, p. 743? The second account says: "And straightway in the morning [Matthew says it was at night] the chief priests bound Jesus and brought him before Pilate." Matt. xxvii, 1, says it was in the morning, and not in the night, as "W. H. R." would hav it, hence no contradiction.

Also, will "W. H. R." giv reliable proof for his sweeping statement that "this story was woven in the gloom of ancient monasteries, and spun from whole cloth?"

Surely, as Liberal investigators, we would all feel responsible to truth and fact, before whose tribunal we must all, sooner or later, giv an account, or there is no equity in this earthly sphere. Truth and fact must rule. It may be represented in pre-existing intelligence (God), or its own nativ excellence, but its sovereign power and excellency is sure of triumphant victory. WILLIAM KIRBY.

Standing upon his Head.

About two months ago a young man calling his name Joe Weber came to this city, assuming the role of an evangelist. It is said that Weber has been under disciplin previously as a minstrel performer, but for some cause changed his professional pursuit to that of a minister. This strange and very erratic man was received and encouraged by the First Methodist Episcopal church in this city, and he held forth in one of the largest houses in the town for about two months; much of the time one session in the afternoon and one in the evening. When Mr. Weber first came into town the word went out through the city that he stood on his head when he prayed. I think this statement was true, so far as a person could stand on his head and remain on his knees at one time, but it was not true, as many probably supposed, that he stood on his head with his feet dangling in the air like some circus performer. His posture was like an eccentric or frantic quadruped, with the top of the head turned to the floor, between the forward legs or arms. And when he took this crazy position, that his great humility might not be doubted, he was careful to be in a conspicuous place before the immense audiences which assembled to see the fun.

The papers of the city assumed diverse attitudes in regard to the propriety or the impropriety of Weber's course. The Evening Star, a sharp and spicy sheet, placed the notices of Weber's meetings in line with the opera and theatrical performances, sometimes under such headings as "Weber's Antics," with a matinee in the afternoon, and regular performance in the evening, etc. The Citizen, a paper supposed to be the most popular Republican sheet in the county, took the position that Weber's eccentricities should be overlooked upon the plea that he is a Christian minister, and the cause being good, the manner or methods should not be questioned. The Patriot, a Democratic publication, took rather passiv ground, but so far as points were made, they were not generally very complimentary to the evangelist. A German paper took a very disparaging position, and called Mr. Weber a mountebank, an impostor, etc.

In many instances Mr. Weber manifested a very tyrannical and abusiv spirit. When his maneuvers became so strongly ridiculous that persons could not refrain from laughing at them, he became most indignant, and in some instances it is said he actually drove good and well-disposed people from the house, and at the same time made the most emphatic and dogmatic threat that any others who should be found laughing should be served in like manner. In this respect Mr. Weber was not half as liberal or as consistent as the actors in the other places of amusement. In these places it is expected that people will act spontaneously and naturally—laugh or weep according to the points made in the acts upon the stage before them. The Methodist church claims an addition to the communion of a large enlistment under Mr. Weber's efforts.

Simultaneously with the termination of the great evangelical effort in the city, the tragic and triple murder of the Crouch family occurred. I think it is not claimed by anyone that there was any direct connection between one of the greatest murders which ever occurred in the history of this county, or the state, and this terribly exciting evangelical effort. But when the Christian clergy claimed at the funeral of the murdered victims that more such murderous scenes would occur if it were not for the Christian religion and the influence of the church, reflectiv and philosophical minds naturally inquire how it is that such an unprecedented scene of murder, laying four adult persons still in death at one fell blow, should occur so directly upon the termination of one of the wildest and most frantic evangelical efforts in the history of Jackson? MARY JONES; OR, THE INFIDEL SCHOOL-TEACHER. By Elmina D. Slenker. Published by The Thinker Company, McPherson, Kan. Price, 15 cents. For sale at this office.

This story is of an Infidel school-teacher whose hand is sought in marriage by a Christian young man. She converts him, and then marries him. The plot is unfolded in a series of letters written in Mrs. Slenker's well-known plain, straightforward style. Admirers of "The Darwins" and "John's Way" will find this little work as good as those.

A DISCUSSION OF THE SOCIAL QUESTION. Between Juliet H. Severance, M.D., and David Jones, editor of the Olive Branch. Price, 15 cents. Sold by Mrs. Severance, 219 Grand avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.

The occasion of this pamphlet is, that Mr. Jones made some strictures upon the social reformers attending the Lake Pleasant camp-meeting, in the Olive Branch, attributing to them sentiments Mrs. Severance says they do not hold. Mrs. Severance's name was dragged in, and she was accused of intruding upon the Spiritualists "her vile dictums." She promptly gave Mr. Jones the alternativ of retracting or standing a libel suit. He chose the former, and in publishing Mrs. Severance's vindication also made some criticisms of her speech which she thought called for an answer. This opportunity Mr. Jones refused to afford her in the columns of the Olive Branch. Hence this pamphlet.

It is evident that Mr. Jones is an unwilling participant in the debate, and equally evident that Mrs. Severance is determined to set herself right before the world in spite of his unwillingness. According to the common understanding of the term, Mrs. Severance is a Freelover; according to her definition of the word, everybody else is, too. Mr. Jones is a great stickler for morality; Mrs. Severance also thinks it the summum bonum of existence. Mr. Jones is endeavoring to "awaken a deeper love for the pure, noble, and true." Mrs. Severance "is as earnest in her desires for that result as Mr. Jones can be." Both profess to be striving to better the condition of the world, and about the only difference of opinion is, that Mrs. Severance holds that greater social freedom would restrain people from vice, while Mr. Jones is firmly of the opinion that legal restraint is necessary to prevent the social fabric from tumbling about our ears.

Those interested in this subject should send to Mrs. Severance for a copy of the book.

HORSES: THEIR FEED AND FEET. A manual of Horse Hygiene, invaluable for the veteran or the novice, pointing out the causes of "malaria," "glanders," "pink eye," "distemper," etc., and how to prevent and counteract them. By C. E. Page, M.D., with a treatis and notes on shoeing by Sir George Cox and Col. M. C. Weld. Fowler & Wells, publishers. 150 pages, 12mo; paper, 50 cents; extra cloth, 75 cents. For sale by THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The value of most of horses to their owners is measured by the amount and length of service that can be secured, and therefore all information relativ to his care is very important. We hav here, the author claims, much that is valuable on the care of horses that has not before been published. The subject is considered from a new and original standpoint, and stated in a plain, practical, common-sense manner, showing how by proper care we may add many valuable years of life and usefulness to our horses. It discusses very fully the best means of putting horses in "condition" and keeping them so; the relation of feed to work, the best kinds of feed, and when and how to feed for the best results, including the care of work-horses and of road-horses. Tells how Mr. Bonner and others care for their valuable stock and keep them always in condition, and at less cost for feed than is usual with farmers and others. The causes of the various diseases to which he is subject, with methods of treatment, are given. The question of shoeing is fully considered, different ways are considered, and it is shown how under many conditions horses will do better service without shoes than with them, and Col. M. C. Weld, who is well-known authority, adds a valuable chapter giving his experience with barefoot horses. There is also an illustrated chapter on the "Signs of Character," and the training of horses. It is safe to say that to every owner of a horse this book would prove invaluable.

HEALTH IN THE HOUSEHOLD; or, Hygienic Cookery. By Susanna W. Dodds, M. D. 12mo, pp. 601, extra cloth. Fowler & Wells publishers. Price $2. For sale at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

The author is enthusiastic in her work voluminously setting forth the why and wherefore of cookery, and devoting a larger portion of the work to those articles which the hygienic reformer advocates as essential to good blood, strong bodies, and vigorous minds. Dr. Dodds says for herself that "the object of the work is to enable health-seekers to furnish their tables with food that is wholesome, and at the same time palatable. . . . The food products of the earth, properly grown and prepared, should be not only healthful, but to the unperverted palate relishable in the highest degree; foods as ordinarily cooked are robbed of their own luscious flavors and rich juices by all manner of wasteful and injudicious processes—by soaking, by parboiling, by evaporation, by under-cooking, and by burning—after which one tries in vain to compensate for these defects by adding butter, pepper, sugar, salt, and other seasonings, ad infinitum."

The book is divided into three parts designated respectivly, "The Reason Why," "Hygienic Dietary," and the "Compromise." In the first department the author sets forth the evidences in favor of a pure hygienic dietary, quoting liberally from authorities recognized in the world of physiological science. In part second are recipes made up in accordance with these views. The "Compromise Diet" is a medium course between the strictly physiological and the common methods in vogue among people at large. Here the book will prove most useful to the great majority of people. The recipes as well as the information, general directions, etc., are given in explicit, simple language so that no one can mistake them. Perhaps the author may be a little too severe in her condemnation of many things that most people consider excellent and healthy eating, but she has embodied so much good sense and so many valuable hygienic hints and recipes in her 590 pages that the health-seeking housewife will not care to quarrel with her.

Queries.

Do Liberals really believe in woman's equality with man, or are their resolutions to that effect mere sops thrown to women to get their help to carry on the work?

I am often amazed at the apparent lack of sincerity in this respect, as I am to-day, in reading the list of lecturers engaged for the Salamanca Convention, to find there are ten men positivly engaged and three more prospectivly, and not one woman's name in the list. It would hav looked peculiar to hav seen the whole list of speakers women, would it not? And yet why would it look any more so than does the present arrangement?

It would seem that where there are so few societies or organizations that profess to believe woman should enjoy the same rights and privileges as man, those that do so profess, if they were sincere, would be very anxious to show their faith by their works in this as well as other respects.

It is time that Liberal women resented this discrimination, and where meetings are called and women speakers are ignored, let women allow men alone to make up the audience, and perhaps we could in this way teach a lesson to them that it seems very hard for them to learn. It is humiliating in the extreme to be always compelled to urge the name of some woman when at any of our meetings, officers are to be elected, instead of seeing men willing to select women as well as men, because they are Liberals and competent for the places.

It is a well-known fact that we hav women in our ranks equal in ability to any of the men to instruct the public or to act in any official capacity from that of president to door-tender. Then why not giv them an equal opportunity freely and gladly, instead of compelling them to contend for it or else silently submit to the insult of being either forgotten or ignored? Or, if men believe, as would be inferred from their conduct in these matters, that women are inferior in mental capacity and social power, let them be honest enough to so declare. Then we would know just what to expect. When Liberals act up to their avowed principles in this as well as all other respects, they will deserve the consideration and respect they desire from all fair-minded men and women, and not till then.

Paul's Voyage to Rome.

In the first verse of the next chapter the Syriac and Greek versions differ as follows:

Syriac.	Greek.
And Festus commanded respecting him, that he should be sent to Italy unto Cæsar; and he delivered Paul, and other prisoners with him, to a certain man, a centurion of the Augustan cohort, whose name was Julius (xxvii, 1).	And when it was determined that we should sail into Italy, they delivered Paul, and certain other prisoners, unto one named Julius, a centurion of the Augustan band (speires Sebastes).

Festus had supreme authority in Judea A.D. 62; Agrippa II. had none at all; but prior to 12 B.C. Marcus V. Agrippa had power to overrule even Herod the Great.

"The cohort named 'Augustus' may hav consisted of volunteers from Sebaste [Samaria, rebuilt by Herod the Great]. Others, however, think it was a cohors Augusta, similar to the legio Augusta. The headquarters of the Roman forces in Judea were at Cesarea" (Smith's Bib. Dic., art., Army).

Julius Antonius, son of Mark Antony, married a niece of Augustus. By the favor of Augustus he was chosen pretor, 13 B.C., and consul, 10 B.C. He was condemned to death 2 B.C. This is the Julius Antonius whose edict, as proconsul, confirming the rights of the Jews in Ephesus, is transcribed by Josephus (Ant. xvi, 6 § 7).

"And when we were to depart we embarked in a ship which was from the city of Adramyttium [forty miles east of Troas, in Mysia], and was going to the country of Asia. And there embarked with us in the ship, Aristarchus, a Macedonian, of the city of Thessalonica (2).

Aristarchus, one of Paul's companions all the way from Macedonia, now embarks with the apostle, but not as one of the prisoners. Nevertheless Paul afterward writes to the Colossians saying, "Aristarchus, my fellow-captiv, saluteth you" (Col. iv, 10), and in the letter to Philemon he sends a similar salutation, styling Aristarchus a coadjutor, and by implication a fellow-captiv (23, 24).

"And the next day we arrived at Zidon (3).

The distance from Ceserea to Sidon is seventy miles in a straight line.

"And the centurion treated Paul with kindness, and permitted him to visit his friends and be refreshed" (3).

For centurion the Greek has Julius. Shall we venture to suspect that this kind-hearted officer was afterward pretor (13 B.C.), then consul (10 B.C.), and lastly, proconsul of Asia?

"And on sailing from there, because the winds were against us, we sailed around to Cyprus" (4).

The meaning is that they sailed around the northeastern end of the island.

"And we passed over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia to Myra, a city of Lycia" (5).

From Sidon to Myra by the direct course was about four hundred miles; but the ship had been driven out of its course, and had probably sailed over five hundred miles.

"And there the centurion found a ship of Alexandria, which was going to Italy, and he set us on board of it. And as it was hard navigating, we had scarcely arrived after many days over against the isle of Cnidos" (6, 7).

The Greek name Knidos is rendered Gnidus in the Vulgate and Douay, and it was at first Gnidus in King James's Bible, but is now spelt with a C. From Myra to Cnidos was about one hundred and thirty miles.

"The isle of Cnidos" is peculiar to the Syriac version. There was once a city of great consequence at the extreme southwestern extremity of Asia Minor, situated on a promontory; but being joined by an artificial causeway to the mainland, it was in fact an island (McCl. and Str. Cyc.). The Syriac version is therefore right.

"And because the wind would not allow us to pursue a straight course, we sailed around by Crete, and came opposit the city of Salmone" (7).

Here again the Syriac has "the city of," while the Greek has simply "Salmone." The ancient name of the eastern headland of Crete was Salmoneon or Sammonium (McCl. & Str. Cyc.), but as to a city of that name on the island we know nothing.

"And with difficulty, after sailing about it, we arrived at a place called Fair Havens, near to which was the city called Lassa" (8).

The Greek codices hav Lasaia, Lasca, Lassaia, and Alassa; the Vulgate has Thalassa. Cramer mentions coins of a Cretan town by this latter name. Smith's Bible Dictionary says that nothing was known of Fair Havens and Lasea until 1856, when a yachting party made inquiries at Fair Havens and were told that the name Lasea was still given to some ruins a few miles eastward. A short search sufficed to discover the ruins, and independent testimony confirmed the name. Fair Havens appears to hav been practically the harbor of Lasea. But a Venetian manuscript published in 1559 describes Lapsea, with a temple in ruins and other vestiges, near the same harbor (McCl. & Str. Cyc.). From Cnidos to Lasea was about two hundred miles.

"And we were there a long time, and till after the day of the Jewish fast. And it was hazardous there for anyone to go by sea" (9).

The Greek omits "Jewish." This fast was on the 10th of Tirsi, or about the time of the equinox in September.

"And Paul counseled them and said: Men, I perceive that our voyage will be attended with peril, and with much loss, not only of the cargo of our ship, but of our lives" (10).

For "loss" the Douay and King James Bibles hav "damage," but in the revised New Testament it is "loss," thus making Paul a false prophet, as the sequel shows.

"But the centurion listened to the pilot and to the owner of the ship, more than to the words of Paul. And because that harbor was not commodious for wintering in, many of us desired to sail from it, and if possible to reach and to winter in a certain harbor, which was called Phenix, and which opened toward the south" (11, 12).

Ptolemy and Strabo mention a town named Phœnix in Crete, and Ptolemy alone mentions a haven of similar name (Smith's Bible Dic.). As to the direction of the opening of this harbor we hav a diversity of information, as follows:

Syriac.	King James.	Revision.
"Which looked toward the south" (xxvii, 12).	"Lieth toward the southwest and northwest."	"Looking northeast and southeast."

The Greek words are: "Bleponta Kata Liba kai kata Choron; and the Vulgate has: "Looking toward the Afric and the Chore."

We giv also three different versions of the next verse:

Syriac.	Greek.	Vulgate.
"And when the south wind breezed up, and they hoped to arrive as they desired, we began to sail around Crete" (xxvii, 13).	"And when the south wind blew softly, supposing that they had obtained their purpose, loosing thence they sailed close by Crete."	"And the south wind blowing, they thinking that they had obtained their purpose, when they had parted from Asson, sailed along by Crete."

The Vulgate translator made a stupid blunder, which is repeated in the Douay version, mistaking the Greek adverb asson, meaning "near," for the accusativ of Assos, a town in Mysia (Acts xx, 14), three hundred miles north of Lasea.

"And shortly after, a tempest of wind arose upon us, called Typhonic Euroclydon" (14).

The Greek codices omit Typhonic, "resembling a whirlwind," and do not agree about the other word. Some hav Eurocludon, and others Eurakulon. It is translated "Euroclydon" in King James, but "Euraquilo" in the Revision, and it is "Euroaquilo" in the Vulgate. The question is, What was the direction of wind? Euros means "southeast wind," and eurokludon "northwest wind," or "hurricane."

"And the ship was whirled about by the wind and could not keep head to it, and we resigned the ship to its power. And when we had passed a certain island called Cyra, we could hardly retain the boat" (15, 16).

For Cyra some of the Greek codices hav "Cauda," and others Clauda. There is an island off the south coast of Crete now called Gozzo, said to be a corruption of "Claudanesa" or "Gaudonesi" (Smith's Bib. Dic.). If it was ever called Cyra, the name was perhaps in some way connected with Cyrene in Africa, right opposit.

"And after hoisting it on board we girded the ship around the waist and made it strong. And because we were afraid of falling upon a precipice of the sea we pulled down the sail, and so we drifted" (11).

For "precipice" the Greek has "the quicksands," or, as in the revised New Testament, "the Syrtis." The gulf Syrtis Major on the southern shore is now called Gulf of Sidra.

A ludicrous error occurs just here in King James's version, which reads, "Strake sail and so were driven." It is corrected in the Revision to "lowered the gear." To strike sail in such a hurricane would be certain destruction.

Mr. Follet's Plans.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: John E. Remsburg delivered three lectures here on Sunday and Monday last, to the largest audiences (except, perhaps, those of Colonel Ingersoll) that hav ever greeted a Liberal lecturer in this state. The entire seating capacity of one of the finest opera houses in Illinois was nearly all occupied by an appreciativ audience, who testified to their appreciation by rounds of applause.

I hav perfected an arrangement with Mr. Remsburg, to make engagements for him for a course of lectures in such places as desire his services during the coming months of February and March, in the states of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin. Three lectures will be considered a course on this trip, yet a few engagements may be made for one or two, with such places as cannot afford to arrange for a full course. His terms are the most reasonable of any lecturer in the Liberal field to-day, and this will be an excellent opportunity for those who desire to hear this gifted orator to do so. The friends of Liberalism residing in the towns and cities of the states of Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin desiring to secure the services of Mr. Remsburg for lectures this winter, will please correspond with me at the earliest possible moment, so that I can arrange routes and perfect all needed arrangements in time to hav the lectures fully advertised. For terms, time, and other information that may be desired, please address me as soon as possible, at Bloomington, Ill.

F. F. FOLLET, Secretary State L. L. of Ill.

P. S.—After accompanying Mr. Remsburg during his lecturing tour in February and March, for the purpose of selling and scattering Liberal literature at the lectures, I expect to go into the state of Indiana for the next year, to try and work up the Liberal movement in that state as I hav been doing in Illinois for the past three years. My success in such an undertaking will depend entirely on the help and encouragement I get from the friends of Liberalism in Indiana; and I hope that they will all second my undertaking, and write me on reading this. "If I be Lifted up, I Will Draw All Men Unto Me."

The minister whom we recently heard preach from the above text, and whose ability for expounding the scriptures is not to be called in question, said that the word if might to some seem to imply doubt, which, he said, it did not. Christ, he said, fully understood the kind of death he would die; that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so would he be lifted up; showing conclusivly that his death would be upon the cross. What a fit comparison, thought I, ludicrous as it might seem, that as the brazen image of the Eden-tempter, Satan, was once lifted up on the cross as the savior of mankind, so now must Christ, God's image, be lifted up for the same purpose! No doubt the one was just as effectual as the other, and I see no good reason why, in the latter case, a brazen image would not hav answered the purpose fully as well. Certain it is, that if an image made of brass to represent Satan, or a serpent, as he is termed, could appease God's anger and atone for the sins of the Israelites, one of the same kind would afterward hav been good enough for the gentiles, and certainly preferable to the murdering of an innocent man. "It might furthermore appear," he added, "that the word all in the text conveyed a false statement, as from other passages of scripture all men are not drawn to Christ. Our savior," he said, "didn't mean to convey that idea, as Christ very well knew many were so steeped in sin and given over to hardness of heart as not to permit his saving influence to reach them."

His explanation of the language was that the gospel would be preached to all nations, and that Jesus would draw from them men from all classes and grades of society. The explanation was no doubt acceptable to his congregation, but to me it seemed quite a perversion of language. In the course of his remarks he undertook to show that Christ is the center of all religions. "It was once believed," he said, "that this earth was fixed, and that the sun and other planets revolved around it. It has since been ascertained that the sun is the center of the planetary system around which the other planets revolve, and that like as they are drawn toward the sun that lights up the universe, so are the different churches drawn to Christ." This simile might do, were it not that he has gone back on the Bible and the Rev. John Jasper, who shows from the Bible that the sun, instead of the earth, "do move."

Another pulpiteer in this place made the statement that morality without religion was of little worth, and would never take a man to heaven; that a strictly moral man who is not a Christian is a dangerous man in society. Surely a strictly moral man is much less to be feared than a man who utters such sentiments. Does he really understand the meaning of language? What, I wonder, would his Christianity be worth without morality? Indeed, at this enlightened age, Christianity without morality would find few advocates. During the Dark Ages, when Christianity had full sway, morality was scarcely thought of, and what was the state of society? Ignorance, theft, murder, and licentiousness had no limits, while intelligence and moral virtues were hardly known. Christianity had become the state religion of the Roman empire. Paganism had become almost entirely eradicated within her borders. But what was the moral condition of her people? Salvian, a Christian clergyman of the fifth century, said: "The very church of God, which ought in all things to please God, does but provoke him to anger. With the exception of a very few who flee from vice, almost every Christian congregation is but a sink of vices. For you will find in the church scarcely one who is not either a drunkard, or a glutton, or an adulterer, . . . or a robber, or a manslayer, and, what is worse than all, almost all these without limit" (Miall's Memorials of Early Christianity, p. 336).

The primitiv Christians, we are led to suppose, were models of virtue. Paul taught that "A man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, . . . for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified" (Gal. ii, 16). "Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law" (Rom. iii, 28). "To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness" (Rom. iv, 5). Luther, the great Protestant reformer, in his "Table Talk," said, "Every doer of the law and every moral worker is accursed, for he walketh in the presumption of his own righteousness." "If men only believe enough in Christ, they can commit adultery and murder a thousand times a day without periling their salvation." "He that says the gospel requires works for salvation, I say flat and plain he is a liar." Wesley, referring to certain clergymen of England, says, "They are well pleased that their parishioners grow more diligent and honest . . . in a word, to be moral and wise. But the truth is, the Methodists know and teach that all this is nothing before God" (Wesley's Mis. Works, vol. iii, p. 99).

According to the teachings of the church, a man may liv a pure and noble life, and yet, if he does not believe her senseless dogmas, he is damned. A man may lead a life of vice and crime, and yet if he believes, he is saved.

Christ, it is true, taught morality, as did also Confucius and Buddha centuries before.

To what extent the apostolic churches believed in and practiced the morality taught by Christ is apparent in Paul's letter to the church at Corinth. He says, "It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication, too, as is not so much as named among the gentiles" (1 Cor. vi, 8). "Ye do wrong and defraud, and that your brethren" (vi, 8). "Brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers" (vi, 6). The morals of the great apostle, Paul, the founder of the Christian religion, were none of the best—certainly not what might hav been expected from one claiming to be divinely inspired.

Hear him! "All things are lawful for me, but I will not be brought under the power of any. . . . Hav we not power (Paul and Barnabas, who, after a foolish and exciting quarrel, separated with bitter feelings toward each other) to lead about a sister, a wife as well as other apostles. . . . Or, I only and Barnabas, hav we not power to forbear working? . . . If any man think that he behaveth himself uncomely toward his virgin, if she pass the flower of her age and need so require, let him do what he will, he sinneth not; let them marry" (1 Cor. vii, 12; ix, 5–6; vii, 36).

Again, "For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner. . . . I am made all things to all men that I might by all means save some. . . . But be it so, I did not burden you, but nevertheless, being crafty, I caught you with guile. . . . I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you service" (Rom. iii, 7; 1 Cor. ix, 22; 2 Cor. xii, 16; xi, 8). Through bigotry and blinded zeal, Paul regarded it all right to lie for the glory of God, and because he had done so that the truth of God might more abound, he asks, Why am I yet judged as a sinner? Why? sure enough, when he further asserts that "therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law. . . . And with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation" (Rom. iii, 28, x, 10). The Christian fathers all taught that it was right to lie and deceive, when, by so doing, the gospel could be promoted and Christianity advanced. "The end justifies the means." Yes, lie, defraud, use strategy, be all things to all men, rob other churches even, for the glory of God—in short, commit any crime, if you will, but "confess with the mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. x, 9).

This we must accept as Christianity—certainly not morality. Few persons, can it be said, attach more importance than the apostle Paul to faith. His epistles abound in absurd, dogmatic beliefs. Therein seems to consist his principal inspiration. To believe for himself and others present and future happiness and misery, was an easy thing; but, notwithstanding he had received the gift of the Holy Ghost, and is supposed to hav lived and written under its holy influence, and was, no doubt, a full-fledged Christian, he found it quite difficult to be a moralist. In the seventh chapter of Romans, beginning at the fourteenth verse, he says: "For we know that the law is spiritual, but I am carnal, sold under sin. For that which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good. Now then it is no more I that do it, but sin (Holy Ghost, Paul) that dwelleth in me. For I know that in me (that is, in my flesh) dwelleth no good thing; for to will is present with me, but how to perform that which is good, I find not. For the good that I would, I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do. Now if I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. I find then a law that when I would do good, sin is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man. But I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. Oh wretched man that I am; who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord. So then with the mind, I, myself, serve the law of God; but with the flesh, the law of sin." The great trouble with Paul was, he wasn't "born right;" for John, in his first epistle, says: "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin because he is born of God."

But Paul's faith, being firm and unshaken, determined, as he said, to know nothing but Christ and him crucified, was his passport to heaven, despite his lack of morality.

If the great apostle who was in direct communication with heaven, who was guided and influenced by the holy spirit in establishing a religion that would be as lasting as time, and that would revolutionize and convert the entire world, was unable to reconcile morality with Christianity, the church, at this remote period of its existence, will find the task none the less difficult. In fact, it is unjust that an attempt, even, should be made to incorporate it into the church, and claim it as a part of Christianity. They are separate and distinct systems, and can't properly be connected. Christianity is founded, not upon knowledge, not upon generous actions and noble deeds, but upon faith in the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, in the acknowledgment of him as the savior of the world, and baptism in the name of the father, son, and Holy Ghost. This none will deny, while the promis of salvation—if anyone knows what that means—and eternal life is offered to those who will accept this belief. He that rejects it Christ said should be damned (Mark xvi, 16). This is the Christianity Paul believed and taught, the gospel which should be preached to every creature. It is not, therefore, strange that Paul found it so difficult to harmonize those two conflicting elements of his nature, the moral with the religious; the real with the imaginary; the natural with the supernatural? Nor is it strange that the same trouble is experienced by professing Christians at this and previous stages of the church's existence, its Christianity being inferior to its morality. We need not wonder, then, that a strictly moral man should be decried from the pulpit, a dangerous man to the cause of Christianity. His upright conduct and noble traits of character speak volumes in his praise in contrast with the silly, nonsensical sermons preached, and hav much to do with dissuading rational, thoughtful people from becoming Christians. He sees too much that is false and hypocritical in the church to be a Christian himself, and is therefore regarded as a stumbling-block in the way of others. Morality is by no means the product of Christianity. Ere the dawn of civilization morality had its origin; and, centuries before Christianity had an existence, morality was taught and practiced by pagan idolaters. As above stated, it was in the course of time incorporated into the church, and under the garb of Christianity taught as one of its concomitants. And I may say one of its most essential ones, too, for without it Christianity would cease to make converts, dwindle, and soon become extinct.

The Bible and Christianity affirm that man is a miserable, helpless sinner, and can escape the burning tortures of an endless hell and be restored to God's favor only by casting his load of crime and guilt upon Jesus as his savior and mediator between God and man, which is cowardly and unjust.

Morality assures him there is no fire and brimstone hell, and that he is not a helpless sinner, but inspires him with confidence in his own ability to develop into a higher and nobler life, thus becoming his own savior, which is just, and more commendable to an honest God.

The churches employ the clergy to think for them, and Christianity offers a reward in a future life for faith and obedience in this.

Morality would hav all think for themselvs, act rationally and conscientiously, believe nothing unauthenticated, and do right because of the happiness it brings, as well as from a sense of justice. Christianity takes people to heaven through faith in the mysterious efficacy of the spilt blood of a man who died centuries ago.

Morality teaches people to be honest and upright, doing all the good and as little harm as possible, as the safest and most rational method of securing happiness in any life. J. S. LYON, M. D.

"Back from the Jaws of Death."

The following is the London Freethinker's account of the release of W. J. Ramsey from Holloway prison on Saturday, Nov. 30th, after serving a nine months' sentence for blasphemy:

The second of our three friends is out of the Christian clutches. Six months hav elapsed since Henry A. Kemp was set free, and now, after an imprisonment of nine months, William James Ramsey is in our midst again. The rejoicings of Freethinkers the whole world over will be great, though they will be tempered by the thought that one other martyr, George William Foote, is yet suffering at the hands of the cursed creed of Christianity.

Those who were wakeful on Friday night last because of the thought that when morning dawned their friend was again to be free in body as he always has been in mind, were a little troubled at the tremendous noise of the storm that raged almost through the night. So incessant and so strong was the rain that it seemed as if all hope of a gathering of any extent at so early an hour as 8.45 A.M. would hav to be abandoned. Even when the daylight came reluctantly, things looked no more promising. But, happily, as the ardent adherents of Freethought were on their way towards Holloway, by degrees the weather cleared, and somewhile ere our friend was liberated the sun was shining as brightly as on a day in spring.

Without doubt the rough weather kept hundreds of people away. Yet, in spite of it, there was a goodly crowd outside the prison gates before 8.30, and a quarter of an hour later its numbers were tripled or quadrupled. It was goodly in another sense than that of numbers. I suppose the sight of so many neatly-clad men an women, with honest, working faces, waiting for the release of a prisoner was a unique one. Had Mr. Justice North and our virtuous Home Secretary seen them, they might have felt ashamed, were either of these tyrants—brutalized by their disgraceful creed—capable of such an emotion.

Within the outer gates of the prison two carriages were drawn up by 8.20 A.M. In the former had been Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, and the two Misses Bradlaugh; in the second Mrs. Ramsey, Mrs. Foote, the Rev. W. Sharman, and Dr. Edward Aveling. These, sitting in the carriages, or walking to and fro, with the exception of Mr. Bradlaugh, early admitted within the prison doors, were joined later by Mr. Symes, whilst the ubiquitous pressmen were generally pervading the place.

Just before 8.45 Mrs. Ramsey was also admitted within the prison, and a few minutes after, the door opening, her husband issued forth a free man once again. Then the crowd sent up a shout, and many shouts, that must hav done his stanch heart good, and the cheers never ceased or slackened until he was beyond the hearing of them. So hearty were they that the horses of the second carriage, as they approached the prison gates, were frightened, and swerved. But for dexterous driving an accident must hav happened. It was but by an inch or two that the wheels missed the pillars of the gate.

Our freed friend was in the second of the two, with his wife by his side. Opposite them were Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, and on the box Dr. Edward B. Aveling. Through a line whose walls were a crowd of waving arms and hats, and eager faces all aglow with delight and affection, he was borne, and then swiftly through the London streets, just astir with the life from which he has been shut out for three-quarters of a year, to Old street and the Hall of Science, where there was also a goodly number of people assembled, who saluted William Ramsey most warmly.

Several vehicles followed in the wake of the two carriages, and people in the streets and on the omnibuses, clerk-laden, hurrying cityward, pointed him out one to the other as the man that had been imprisoned because he dared to join in assailing the wicked belief that, unable to meet us in argument, or to bear our laughter and our sneers, thinks in its senile folly to stop the progress of its decay by the imprisonment of brave and honest men.

Inside the hall a breakfast had been prepared, to which some sixty or seventy delegates, representing various workingmen's clubs and branches of the National Secular Society, sat down.

The chair was taken by Mr. Symes, who was supported by Mr. and Mrs. Ramsey, with their little daughter, the Rev. W. Sharman, and Mrs. Foote.

At the conclusion of the meal the chairman said that that was not the time for much speech making. They had met to congratulate their friend, Mr. Ramsey, on his release from prison. He personally did so most heartily, as he was one of the party, and ought to hav been sent to prison if anyone was. Of the two he thought he was rather worse than Mr. Ramsey. But they knew that sending the latter to prison was an outrage. (Cheers.) The only dark spot on the festivity of the morning was the fact that Mr. Foote was still in prison; but they would giv him as hearty a welcome when he came out! (Cheers.)

The Rev. W. Sharman moved the following resolution: "That this meeting heartily rejoices to meet Mr. Ramsey at the expiration of his unjust imprisonment, and congratulates him on the moral courage he has displayed during the nine months' suffering for conscience sake." It was hard sometimes to believe that there really existed such a law in England as that the results of which they saw to-day. He could only say that Mr. Ramsey had their sincere sympathy all through. The existing state of the law was most iniquitous, and he trusted to-day's event would nerve them to work until such a thing became impossible in the future. They must remember that they had still another friend in prison, where he would remain until February 25th. Then, however, they hoped to see him either in that hall, or some other place, in good health and with a good heart. (Cheers.) In the mean time, the only thing they could do was to endeavor to make the name of liberty in England a reality, and not a sham. (Cheers.)

Mr. Truelove, whom the chairman described as also having suffered for conscience sake, said that four months' imprisonment had shown him the horrors and discomforts of it, and seconded the resolution, which was carried by acclamation.

Mr. Ramsey, who was received with great applause, said he was sure they would not expect him to say much. He had not been accustomed to public speaking of late (laughter); in fact, he had not been much used to speaking at all. Although he had made many imaginary speeches to brick walls, the excitement this morning was too rather much for him. The sufferings he had undergone were such as no one who had not been shut up in a cell could understand. (Cheers.) He felt it very much the first month, because, according to prison regulations, he was only out of his cell one hour out of twenty-four, and the visit to chapel was the only amusement. (Laughter.) So far as their duties allowed them, every officer in the prison had been kind to him. They seemed to think that the offense for which they were sent to prison was not really one. He succeeded in modifying the views of the chaplain in regard to Freethinkers. He at first was of opinion that they should be transported for life, but afterward came to the conclusion that they should merely be confined in a lunatic asylum. (Laughter.) The doctor and the governor were very kind, and that meeting might take it as a fact that no persons were ill-used in prison unless they deserved it. There was no personal cruelty in prisons. (Cheers.) But the system itself was a bad and cruel one. The effects of his imprisonment was that, whereas before he only despised the Christian's creed, he now hated it heartily, and no fear of future punishment would deter him from doing it henceforth as much damage as he could. (Cheers.) He should consider any day which he allowed to let pass without striking a blow at Christianity as a day lost. He would speak at greater length on his prison life on another occasion. When he accidentally saw Mr. Foote that prisoner appeared to be in good health. He himself was, so far as he could judge, in good health and strength, and was ready to go on in the battle against the "accursed creed." He thanked them very heartily. (Cheers.)

Mr. G. Standring proposed a resolution of sympathy and condolence with Mrs. Foote, which was seconded by Dr. Bond, of Kingston, and carried with acclamation.

An immense audience assembled at the Hall of Science on Sunday, and greeted Mr. Ramsey with great applause upon his presiding at the lecture by Mr. Symes.

Commemoration Services.

None of our readers should forget the commemoration services to be held next Sunday evening, the 23d, to celebrate the sixty-fifth anniversary of the birth of D. M. Bennett, and all in this vicinity should endeavor to be present. The meeting will be held under the auspices of the Bennett Auxiliary Liberal League, at 220 East 15th street, at 8 o'clock, and will be addressed by Messrs. Putnam, Wakeman, Post, Andrews, Chamberlain, and others. Mr. Wilson Macdonald, the sculptor, promises to have a plaster cast of the Bennett medallion on exhibition at the hall. No event more worthy of commemoration than this has taken place in the history of Freethought. There should be an audience present such as the German Masonic Temple never held before.

Incendiary Utterances.

The coming fight is clearly outlined by Mr. Capel, the emissary of Rome now lecturing in this country in the interests of his church. In a talk at Chicago he said:

"The result is, that there is going to be a fight. There are a good many Catholics in this country—8,000,000, somebody says. Your public-school system is inadequate for them, and they are going to leave it. Suppose that the church sends out an authoritativ command to the Catholics to start schools in every parish, and support them, and send all Catholic children to them. It can be done by the utterance of a word, sharp as the click of a trigger. That command will be obeyed. New schools will spring up everywhere. What will be the result of that? A fight! Do you suppose some millions of people are going to pay taxes twice over—once for their own schools, and again for Protestant schools from which they get no benefit? If it isn't a downright fight, it will be at least the warlike condition—a million or two of voting, tax-paying citizens hostil to the government."

There is no difficulty in divining the meaning of this utterance. The Catholic church holds that our public schools, being secular, are heretical to the verge of godliness. The Catholics maintain that the true way to educate a child is to first giv him large doses of religion, and secondly a moiety of secular instruction. As between schools wholly religious or wholly secular, the church chooses the religious, holding that a knowledge of future life is infinitly preferable to a knowledge of this life.

The pastoral letter issued by the Catholic authorities of this country recommended the general establishment of parochial schools and consequent withdrawal of Catholic children from the public schools. This is followed by the bold declaration of this priest that the Catholics will refuse to support both kinds of schools. This means that a demand will be made upon the authorities for a pro rata division of the school fund. This being refused, there will be a fight.

Well, let it come. Something like this is needed to awaken the apathetic to a realization of the danger of fostering religion in this country by a systematic pensioning from state treasuries. The plainest lesson to be learnt from history is that a union of church and state, in any form, is dangerous to the liberties of the people. To evenly balance the scales of justice, a judge or legislativ body should hav no religion, and never, under any pretext or in any shape, should the state let a penny go for religious purposes, or to any benevolent or charitable institution not governed by the officers of the state.

Let us hope that the people of this country will get their eyes open to this before the Catholics make the demand for a partition of the school fund. It will require a large voting force to defeat such a scheme, in New York, for instance. That force undoubtedly exists in the Protestant church, but at present the state is like Christ, crucified between two thieves. It is hardly safe to trust one to reform the other.

The Death of William Denton.

At last the mystery and suspense caused by the imperfect telegraph notice saying Prof. Denton had been a victim of the Java earthquake hav been cleared up.

The brave explorer fell a victim to fever in New Guinea, August 26th. His death was a sacrifice to science. He was, when stricken down, a member of a scientific exploring expedition, sent out at the cost of the Melburne Argus, and commanded by Captain Armitt, who sent to his paper the following account of the professor's death.

"On the 18th of August, Prof. Denton complained of indisposition, but not serious. He had before been suffering from a troublesome ulcer on the instep. As we could not pierce into the range of mountains before us, owing to war between the tribes, I determined to return and make an attempt from a new point. We rested three days at Dedourie, having to climb over Mount Belford, thirty-six hundred feet high. Prof. Denton was completely exhausted, having refused all nourishment and medicin since becoming ill. I remained with him and cheered him along over the summit. Mr. Hunter met us here, and we got on very well. Going down, heavy rain soaked us through, and it was very cold. Belford returned from the village with fresh men and a hammock. We carried Prof. Denton into Lochivago. On the 24th Belford was prostrated by fever, Prof. Denton getting weaker, yet obstinate, even rejecting food as well as physic. On the 26th we started for Moroka, Prof. Denton and Belford on stretchers. The fever attacked me before breakfast, and I had a terrible day. We reached Berigabadi at 2 P.M. The village was deserted. The nativs propped up the crumbling roof of a hut, but the floor had sunk in the center. Mr. Hunter, who was the only sound man of the party, made our beds. Prof. Denton occupied the level space in the center; I lay to his right, and Belford on his left. At half past 8 P.M. Prof. Denton had very slight convulsiv fits. Five minutes afterward he was dead. It was pouring with rain, and the weather was close and sultry. That night we were forced to camp with the dead body between us. Mr. Hunter dug a grave, and we buried our unfortunate friend at 7 on Monday morning."

The manner in which this hero of science spent his last few months is told in a letter by Mr. Denton himself to Mr. Terry, of the Harbinger of Light, a Spiritualist journal published at Melburne, Australia. It is dated, "Thursday Island, July 1st." Speaking of his contemplated trip to New Guinea, he said:

"I do not intend to remain there more than a month. . . It is probable we shall meet at Batavia before going to India, which I still think will be some time in November. . . . We are making large collections of birds, corals, and shells, being camped on the edge of a forest, and within a quarter of a mile of a coral reef whose beauty is beyond description. Our health is excellent, but if you could see us lying on the shingle at the door of our tent you might suppose we were a group of wandering Arabs."

In New Guinea he explored "wilds where the foot of white man never before wandered," as he said in an incompleted letter to Mr. Terry, which is the last writing he ever did. In this letter, dated, "Shugari, New Guinea, August 3d," he writes that he left his sons, Sherman and Shelley, about thirty miles back, and announced his intention to accompany the exploring expedition over the mountain range to the eastern coast of the island. This unfinished letter was forwarded to Mr. Terry by Shelley Denton. It closes with a reference to his lectures at Brisbane, Queensland, in these words: "Our audiences were large, and the interest in the lectures very great."

Thus abruptly closed the career of one of those original minds who hav given the people of the earth their knowledge of the planet on which they liv. His individual researches are a long link in the geological chain which has bound in bands of steel the cruellest foe of humanity, superstition. His labor has been invaluable in removing from the world's mind the belief in a childish legend which cramped and warped all scientific thought. He was free to accept truth and facts in whatever shape he found them, and did not, like pseudo-scientists, feel bound to ascertain if a new found fact agreed with revelation before publishing it to the world. If the Bible corresponded with what he discovered, it was all right; if it did not, so much the worse for the Bible. He was, says the New Zealand Freethought Review, "as indefatigable in the pursuit of his favorit science as he was bold and fearless in his generalizations and conclusions. Implicitly accepting the law of evolution, though differing from its great exponent, Charles Darwin, in some of his speculations, he was able to trace out the successions of life and forms as exhibited in fossil remains, in so clear and convincing a manner that it was difficult for the most orthodox or stubborn to reject his teaching. And he never for a moment subordinated the strict scientific aspect of a question to the craving for sensation or effect. All seemed natural, depending on what had gone before, and bound firmly together by the principle of continuity. It will be difficult to replace such a teacher. Professor Denton was a writer of no mean ability, both in prose and poetry, inspired chiefly by his earnest desire to see humanity raised to a higher plane of existence on the earth. He was a Freethinker, and avowed his opinions boldly; and he was a man whose life would hav adorned any cause. When shall the time come when a monument worthy of his memory shall be erected over his grave in the strange land into the thick darkness of which he had thought to penetrate?"

With his bereaved wife and family the Liberals of the country will mourn. In him is lost not only a faithful husband, father, and friend, but a world's benefactor. His labors crowned his life, and his death was met as he would hav wished, in steadfast pursuit of that science he loved, and which is the world's true savior.

Mr. Kirby Again.

On another page Mr. Wm. Kirby, of Doniphan, Kansas, makes some running comments upon the remarks appended to his letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17th. Health favoring, he proposes, he says, to argue on the questions of the existence of a God, and the probability that such a being prepared the various bibles worshiped by various peoples. Mr. Kirby seems to be an exceedingly fair-minded and gentlemanly man, one of a species of Christians too rarely found, and it will afford us much pleasure to hold, now and then, a friendly talk with him, either on the general subjects he mentions, or the more special ones of alleged revelation to the Jews and the Christian creed.

But we must still insist that these questions must be proved, if proved they can be—but at any rate the attempt must be made—outside of all bibles. For if, as Mr. Kirby says, "the matter of fact and truth contained in the book [meaning, we suppose, the Jewish Bible and Christian, but still Jewish, gospels] may be such that in the nature of things it may be valued evidence in its own behalf," we could and should put in the counter claim that D. M. Bennett's "A Truth Seeker Around the World" is equally divine and from God. It contains an immense amount of "matter of fact and truth." And any other book containing matter of fact and truth can be shown by the same valued evidence in its own behalf to be just as much inspired as the Bible. If one book is inspired be cause it is true, so of all books that are true. If Mr. Kirby claims that only those parts of the Bible are of God that conform to facts, so we can say of all books. And we must further inquire of him where he gets the right to reject such portions of God's books as displease him. Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus, if we may be allowed to use one of Brother Seaver's favorit phrases, applies with sledge-hammer force to the Bible, or to the church's claim for it of plenary inspiration. It is not the legal procedure to show a malefactor's innocence by his own unsupported testimony, although courts sentence a culprit on his own confession. Making rigid and righteous application of this, Mr. Kirby can see that he, as counsel in the case, cannot clear his client in the manner proposed. It would be illegal and not in harmony with the rules of common law, to say nothing of common sense.

We said that the preponderance of evidence is overwhelmingly against the Bible. This Mr. Kirby asserts is an assertion, and proves nothing. Very true. But the evidence in support of the assertion can be easily adduced, although the merest resumè would fill many pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER. A few points may be mentioned.

The creation story is admitted by all scholars to be a fable. The devil is a myth. He is very dead. Mr. Kirby cannot adduce one particle of evidence to show that he ever existed. Hell has also vanished along with him. The flood is a played-out fable. The tower of Babel never existed, and the various languages of the earth did not arise from any such source. Moses's authorship of the Pentateuch is an unfounded claim. Joshua could not hav stopped the sun in its course; the reasons are no doubt familiar to Mr. Kirby. The Bible was not written in the age claimed for it. Many of the prophecies recorded were fulfilled ere spoken, and were no prophecies, but imperfect declamations.

We only mention the most vital imperfections of the Old Testament—facts that are admitted. With the dozens of minor ridiculous stories Mr. Kirby is undoubtedly familiar, as he is with their barbarous and allegorical character. But, rejoins he, to the statement that we know the creation story to be a lie, "may not the lie arise from misunderstanding the Bible?" Well, let us see. The Bible reads:

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Is not that explicit? Any chance for a misunderstanding?

"And God said, Let there be light: and there was light."

Isn't that plain that, according to this, there was light before the sun? or has Mr. Kirby adopted Mr. Talmage's wonderful theory that the light came from the "aurora borealis, or even the aurora australis?" And the further details of the creation are set forth with as much particularity as the two incidents quoted. There is nowhere in the story a chance for a misunderstanding. It is either as recorded or it is not. The adoption of geological eras, or "good whiles," cannot better the case, for the order of events is inextricably entangled. Besides, against this evident attempt to explain what should not need explaining if written by God, we can quote columns on columns of opinions of the very highest Christian authority, from Jesus down to Dr. Hall. And "one who is not a Hebrew scholar can only stand aside and admire the marvelous flexibility of a language which admits of such diverse interpretations." He certainly cannot understand how a God who doeth all things well could hav chosen to write his all-important message in such a language. Mr. Kirby must not be allowed to distort scripture if he is to still remain a believer in revelation. If there are to be different conclusions drawn from Genesis by every reader, and one conclusion is as good as another to get to heaven by, then we fail to see why all men are not "safe," and must question the wisdom of maintaining the churches and missionaries.

Mr. Kirby understands Liberalism better than he seems to understand the logic of theology. Liberalism is "investigationism," a proving all things and holding fast to that which is good. Liberalism dares to question even the acts and words of a god, and if the one be cruel and the other false, Liberals reject such a god, denounce his acts, and repudiate his words. Our platform is free, and we shall take pleasure in helping all candid Christians to climb upon it.

Mr. Kirby says that "most of the preachers follow after the loves, and are blinded by an unconscious selfishness." Perhaps he meant loaves, but if so the error is too unimportant to correct. Between following his loves and gathering the loaves the average preacher's time is fully occupied. It would be hard to tell which is the more important in his eyes, or which he attends to most assiduously.

The questions addressed to Mr. Preston and Mr. Rowan, we leave the respectiv gentlemen to answer. Every writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER is responsible for his words, and we believe they all are ready to sustain their statements or make the proper acknowledgment of error.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG gave two lectures in Powers's Opera House, Grand Rapids, Mich., Sunday, Dec. 9th. The meeting is said to hav been one of the largest Freethought gatherings ever seen in the West. In the afternoon twelve hundred were present. At night, long before the lecture began, every seat was taken, and still the crowd poured in until every inch of standing-room was occupied, and policemen were stationed at the door to turn back the hundreds who still thronged for admission. The subject in the evening was "False Claims." The Grand Rapids Leader characterized it as "a scathing arraignment of modern Christianity," and says that the speaker's words carried conviction with them.

OF Mrs. H. S. Lake's lecture in Ottumwa, Iowa, December 9th, the Democrat of that place says: "Mrs. Lake lectured Sunday evening in Liberal Hall to a good-sized and intelligent audience, on the subject of 'Higher Life.' The lecture was attentivly listened to, and frequently called forth applause. This lady is perhaps one of the ablest lecturers of her sex now on the rostrum. Possessed of a strong individuality of thought, a clear voice, and fine elocutionary powers, makes her an interesting as well as convincing speaker, no matter how widely we may differ with her in religious opinions. She paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of America's greatest philanthropist, Peter Cooper, that found a responsiv chord in the hearts of many of her hearers, and when she said, 'I had rather be Peter Cooper than Queen Victoria or the pope of Rome,' the feeling of the audience could only find relief in applause." Mrs. Lake's engagement at Ottumwa extends through the Sundays of the month of January. She and Mr. W. F. Peck would like week-evening engagements in adjacent towns.

Notes.

THE Rev. Mr. Aiken, of McPherson, Kan., is accused of having been seen drunk in that town. A gentleman also states that the reverend owns a half interest in a saloon at Caldwell, Kan. Mr. Aiken is the shepherd of the Methodist flock at McPherson.

THE Thinker has removed from McPherson to Burr Oak, Kan. Dr. Stowe assures his friends that he and his paper hav a deal of vitality, and he proposes, in spite of his sickness, from which he is rapidly recovering, to make the paper a success. We most cordially wish him success.

CHARLES B. REYNOLDS, who has recently entered the lecture field, has consented to act as our agent, and is authorized to take subscriptions, collect arrearages, and solicit renewals for THE TRUTH SEEKER. He will also hav an assortment of books at the Salamanca Convention, and will supply any friend desiring to purchase.

AN Art Loan Exhibition has been opened in this city in aid of the Bartholdi statue, and several artists hav petitioned the managers to open its doors on Sundays, at a reduced rate, for the accommodation of those whose avocations keep them from visiting the exhibition on week days. The result of the "prayer" is awaited with interest, as several of the patrons of the affair are pronounced and bigoted Sabbatarians.

THE Jesuits of Denver, Col., are endeavoring to raise $25,000 from the people of that city to found a Jesuit college. It is to be hoped the citizens will not be duped into giving this through any specious promises the sly priests may make. If there ever lived an honest Jesuit, he has failed to hav his name handed down. As soon trust a child to the embrace of a serpent as to allow its education to be guided by the followers of Loyola.

FOR a long time, says the Missouri Liberal, the school-house in Look Out district, two miles from Liberal, has been used and abused by revival meetings, until complaint was made to the directors against such abuses, when it became their duty to close it against all gatherings except for school purposes. Under the law of Missouri a school-house cannot be used for any purpose other than schools, if any patron of the district complains, unless authorized by a majority vote.

MR. WATTS departed last Tuesday on the Wisconsin. of the Guion line. He is well pleased with the result of his four months' tour. The work has been hard, the remuneration not excessiv, but the good he and Mr. Chainey hav done will be perceptible for a long time. It is not improbable that he will return in a few months, as he left without accepting all the invitations to lecture he received from Freethought societies. He and Chainey ought to keep constantly in the field in this country and Canada, where they hav hosts of warm friends. Mr. Watts's English address is 74 Herne Hill Road, Loughboro Junction, London, S. E., Eng.

FREEMAN, the Pocasset fanatic, has been committed to an insane asylum for life. This is right. No man who can become fanatical enough to murder his own child should ever be allowed his freedom, though he appear never so sane. As well turn a tame lion loose in the street.—Christian Advocate.

This expression of opinion does credit to our religious contemporary, but we fear unkind people will make it the occasion to ask questions concerning Abraham and Jephthah. And if we understand the Christian salvation scheme, this sweeping denunciation will include as well the father of him who shrieked his life away on the cross of Calvary. Beware, Brother Buckley, or you will be counted along with Newton and Beecher.

ONE religious paper says of Martin Luther:

"Having voluntarily thrown aside the purity of his early life and resisted God's graces, his whole career of meanness, hypocrisy, pride, blasphemy, blackguardism, and gluttony are easy to be understood."

To which Christian sentiment another religious paper responds that the writer of the foregoing deserves to hav applied to him the following remark of Mr. Luther himself:

"They are exactly like hogs, who do not care for the roses and violets in the garden, but only stick their nose into the garbage."

Perhaps it is safe to leave the characters of Christians in the hands of one another, that full justice may be done to all of them.

SAYS the Boston Journal: "The will of Joseph Warren, who died last winter at Bernardston, which has lately been admitted to probate, is a singular document. After providing for the payments of his debts, the testator directs that nothing shall go to his daughters. The will reads: 'My will is that whether I hav $1 or a million at my decease, there must not one cent go to help along religious craft, that relic of barbarism that kingcraft and priestcraft hav managed to keep the world in mental slavery enough to torture and put to death millions for their honest opinions. I direct that there must not be a bell struck at my death or burial, and no man or woman acting in the capacity of a priest is to hav anything to do with the matter, but my executor is to lay me after death where my niece, Mary E. Kimball, shall direct, provided she does not direct him to lay me in any cemetery in Bernardston. If at my death there is any remainder, the interest of said remainder is to be used for the support of my wife, but not one cent for any religious purpose; and at her decease, whether in the hands of my executor or niece, it is to be used to oppose that horrid old monster of kingcraft and priestcraft called religion.' All the property belonging to the estate consists, as far as has been found, of $500 in registered 4 per cent United States bonds."

AN American paper says that Colonel Ingersoll, who has recently moved into his new house at Washington, is about to giv up lecturing on the Freethought platform, and attributes this to the social ostracism which the colonel and his family hav had to endure through his anti-Christian orations. We think the former part of this statement very doubtful.—London Freethinker.

The "former part of this statement" is truer than the latter. Colonel Ingersoll, it is understood, will not lecture this winter. But the "social ostracism" part of the paragraph is a canard. Mr. Ingersoll's house receives scarcely fewer visitors than the White House. He is one of the most popular men in Washington. The fact that a good many of the senators and representativs are almost precisely of his way of thinking does not lessen the attendance at his receptions, nor make him the less respected by those who hav not his courage and boldness of speech. His influence and services are sought by the most powerful. He is way up to the top of the heap, and our London friends will do well to disregard any pious stories to the contrary.

A SUBJECT of interest to our pious friends was discussed on the 11th inst. at the meeting of the Philadelphia Conference of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of Eastern Pennsylvania, in St. Paul's church, Ardmore. It had reference to the cause of the lack of candidates for the ministry. Rev. E. Huber attributed the indifference to "a want of faith and an exaggerated idea as to the hardships of the ministry." Rev. O. F. Waage declared that there was a falling off of fifty per cent in the number of candidates for the ministry during the past six years, according to the parochial reports of the East Pennsylvania Synod. Without taking any action upon the question, the conference took up a kindred subject, that of the decline in Protestantism, the agitation of which, it was contended, was due to the presence of Protestants in the papacy and papists in the Protestant church. "If Protestantism is declining," said Rev. Dr. W. M. Baum, "as rapidly as we are told is the case, it is time to look out for an ecclesiastical undertaker."

COMMENT can add nothing to the ridiculousness of this from the Methodist Advocate. Both the criticised and the criticiser hav hides too pachydermatous to be pierced by the shafts of sarcasm:

"Profane expressions in the worship of God should be frowned upon by all Chirstians. There is a species of low wit in which some indulge in prayer-meetings and class-meetings, at camp-meetings and in revival services, which will cause every reverent person to cringe. One of our ministers, some years since, was preaching from the text, 'The Lord God omnipotent reigneth,' and as he solemnly read his text a brother cried out in the audience, 'Let him reign!' producing a titter among the groundlings, and making the judicious grieve. Another complained of not feeling well, and feared that he would not be able to preach with his accustomed liberty. A brother ejaculated, 'God Almighty, burn his chimney out!' And only a short time ago, at a camp-meeting in Massachusetts, the following irreverent expression was heard from the lips of a man who ought to hav known a great deal better. He said that 'his telephonic connection with the Holy Ghost was special, and could not be cut off.' Such language should be suppressed. No true revival of religion can be helped by it. John Wesley turned many out of the Methodist societies for less irreverence than that, and on one occasion broke up a meeting and sent the people home because a number of persons persisted in talking slang. The bad grammar of an honest, consistent, and spiritually-minded man never does any harm. It is irreverence and vulgarity that we condemn."

THE release of Mr. W. J. Ramsey, an account of which will be found in another column, moves the London correspondent of the Derby Daily Telegraph to say: "After seeing Mr. Ramsey, of the Freethinker, released from Holloway jail on Saturday morning, I went to the breakfast at the Hall of Science, and found the proceedings most interesting. Mr. Ramsay told me that he was treated with perfect kindness within the prison. For the first month, when he was confined to his cell twenty-three hours out of twenty-four, he felt it severely, but after that many of the conditions of ordinary prison life were relaxed in his favor. He had several visits; his food was always palatable, and he had the luxury of receiving books without the bounds of common prison literature. The result of this is that, although he has lost weight in prison, his strength has been well maintained, and his appearance certainly affords no index to the long confinement he has undergone. That, no doubt, is partly due to the resolute nature of the man, and to his evident conviction that his imprisonment will advance the Freethought movement in which he is interested. All the prominent Atheists in London, except Mr. Bradlaugh, who had to leave with his daughters, were there, and they had neither horns nor cloven feet. On the contrary, they were a quiet and inoffensiv-looking company, the men for the most part with thoughtful faces. What struck me as singular was that the women were, if anything, more enthusiastic than the sterner breakfasters. At Holloway they braved the wet morning, and many of them cried as Mrs. Ramsey was beckoned into the jail to see her husband just before he was released. That was a singularly delicate attention on the part of the governor, who seems to hav made a gratifying distinction between Mr. Ramsey and common rogues, and who wanted him to feel the warmth of friendship before he went out again into the world. One of the leading spirits at the breakfast was Mr. Sharman, a Unitarian pastor, and another was Mr. Symes, a man of commanding appearance and high mental acquirements, who tells me he will shortly leave for Australia, there to preach to antipodeans the gospel of Freethought. There can now be no doubt that these ill-advised prosecutions hav added greatly to the strength of the Freethought party in London, and, although making them more careful, will not in any way affect their resolution or their earnestness."

Philosophy on the Half-Shell; or, Ethics of '83.

I will open this essay by quoting a short poem of my own on

GOD.

Tell me, ye stars—bright wonders of the sky—
Tell me of him who speeds ye on your way,
Ye sun-bright seraphs of the boundless space,
Ye glorious pilgrims of immensity!

Know ye of God? God? Hath the awful roar
Of storm-lashed ocean power to hymn his name?—
The red volcano with its thund'rous voice,
That shakes the planet to her burning core?

God? Is there aught in air, in earth, or sea,
In wheeling planet, or in glowing sun,
That tells of him whose birth hath never been—
The king eterne, whose end shall never be?

We, who upon this strip of shifting sand,
Touching Time's shoreless sea, creep one brief day,
What dare we hope to learn of that dim cause
(If cause there be), who such proud wonder planned?

O life! O death! which were the kindlier lot?
Can life be blest when, ever, far and wide,
Gaunt Squalor stalks amid her hideous brood?
Were it not better, man, if thou wert not?

No answer—none! Cease, then, thine idle quest,
Nor longer seek what thou canst never know!
The mystic force that sways yon shining spheres
Deems not ye breathe, or mocks thy weak behest.

DOES GOD EXIST?

It is absolutely impossible to distinguish correctly between a true intuition (if there be such) and a superstition, pure and simple; hence little weight is to be attached to the declaration we so frequently hear, that "something within us assures us that there is a God."

There is no possible gauge by which the truth or falsity of a so-called intuition can be measured.

The strongest argument ever advanced for the existence of God is the marvelous adaptation of means to ends in the universe, from the superb and majestic mechanism of the sidereal heavens to the life of a miniature world upon a single blade of grass.

His existence is entirely speculativ. No one has ever obtained any knowledge of him through the medium of the senses, intellectualists of course dismissing as pure fable the marvelous narrations to be found in holy (?) books, since they are absolutely unsupported by any credible testimony.

His existence, while it would account, in a way, for the apparent purpose in the universe, in no wise accounts for the existence of the universe.

Also, it adds a new and stupendous problem to the God question, viz.: the cause of his existence.

All nations who believed in his existence hav formed subjectiv images of him, differing nearly always from one another, but resembling closely, in every instance, the nations conceiving them.

He apparently never interferes or concerns himself with the affairs of mankind, to protect the innocent and the helpless, nor to punish the guilty and the oppressor.

On every hand we see the strong trample and oppress the weak, the crust withheld from the shriveled lips of famin, and parching lips denied the cooling draught of sweet and wholesome pleasure.

God's deaf ear hears no prayer, or, hearing, turns aside in pitiless, calm indifference,

Even shuffling priests themselvs hav been compelled, by incontrovertible fact, to refer their miserable dupes to another and better world for the justice denied them here.

EVIL.—WHICH IS GOD, WEAK OR WICKED, OR BOTH; OR IS MATTER ITS (EVIL'S) CAUSE?

1. A God (either good or bad), perfect in power and in wisdom, could and would create only a perfect universe (perfect in either pleasure or in pain), supposing creation mathematically possible, which it is not.

To create is to cause something to proceed from nothing, which is as manifestly absurd as to say a part is greater than the whole.

If God did not create, in the above meaning of the word, then he cannot arrogate to himself the proud title of "Creator," but merely that of "Arranger," or, perhaps, of "Governor."

2. A good God, perfect in wisdom, but deficient in power, may exist so hampered by the imperfection and unmalleability of his instrument (matter), that he can only evolve such bungling results, such abortions of perfection, as we see so frequently on this globe.

Water drowns us, fire burns us, cold freezes us, heat prostrates us, misfortune in myriad forms afflicts us from the cradle to the grave, and yet many of us daily tell God what a splendid piece of work we are, so in harmony with nature, and glorify him because it is no worse!!

3. A good God, perfect in power, but deficient in wisdom, may exist. This supposition would account for the frightful suffering with which this world is filled to overflowing.

4. A bad God, perfect in wisdom, may exist, but limited in his exercise of evil by his lack of power to thoroughly control matter.

5. A bad God, perfect in power, but deficient in wisdom, may exist, thus accounting for the portion of happiness in the world.

The above five propositions contain the entire philosophy of the God speculation in a nutshell.

THE EXISTENCE OR NON-EXISTENCE OF GOD OF NO CONSEQUENCE TO MAN.

The existence or non-existence of God is, I grant, a highly interesting inquiry, and occupies deservedly a front rank in the phalanx of modern speculativ thought, but why earth should hav been deluged for long ages with oceans of innocent blood, on account of honest differences of opinion upon this point, it is difficult to conceive.

MAY A PLURALITY OF GODS EXIST?

The apparent universality of the laws governing matter, strongly point to but one God (if any) governing the universe.

In the judgment of some deep thinkers, however, the plural god hypothesis is possessed of much weight, since it would tend to account for the innumerable contradictions of good and evil, presuming the existence of both good and evil deities.

Personally, I attach but very little weight to this view, since it appears to me as quite apparent that a single intelligent or non-intelligent force dominates matter.

However, this supposition is worthy a careful consideration.

It is entirely possible that other deities and other universes exist, distinct from our own, and of which our particular God may be as ignorant as ourselvs.

The consideration of deity may be likened to a vast speculativ sea, upon whose fabled shores no wave-worn mariner has ever touched, and whose sublime and mysterious depths no intellectual plummet has ever sounded.

If but one God exist, how awesome, how solitary would appear his grandeur, companioned by no being to whom he could impart aught save the smallest conceivable iota of the majestic offspring of his intellect!

How solemn, yet how unenviable, must appear to us such an icy eminence!

GOD, IF HE EXIST, NOT FREE.

The arguments which hav been successfully advanced by John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, and numerous other eminent philosophers, disproving the vaunted freedom of the will, apply none the less cogently in the case of a supposititious God, whose mind, perfect or imperfect, could be but a multiplication of the mind of man.

This is the only kind of God of which man is capable of conceiving, since he knows of but one kind of mind. All dogmatical assertions to the contrary must necessarily be incapable of demonstration, although priests descant upon the extravagant relations of substance to nonentity with sublime haut-gout.

The mind of this God (or enlarged man) must either evolve or contain thoughts entirely consonant with its brain-structure (for brain-structure he must hav if he think). If his brain-structure be perfect, then will his thoughts be so; if imperfect, vice versa.

MATERIALITY OF GOD.

If God exist, and influence matter, he must himself consist of matter, however highly sublimated.

Were this not so, no contact could occur, and hence no influence, nor even recognition of mutual existence, could exist.

To the eye of pure reason, that which is not something (i.e. matter), must inevitably be nothing (i.e. absence of this same something). This is the argument in a nutshell.

BASELESS ASSUMPTION THAT GOD IS GOOD.

The Christian bigot most unwarrantably assumes that his supposititious God is good.

All fair-minded men will agree that it is just to judge of a workman by his work.

In the present instance we are constrained to adopt this earth we inhabit as being that specimen of his ability, or intention, most familiar to us. Gauged by this test, we find him to be far from perfect.

True, some — many, perhaps — find existence a blessing; but the under-fed, under-paid, toiling multitudes, esteem life no sinecure, lacking ofttimes the bare necessaries of existence, oppressed on every side, and frequently driven by want to crime, despair, and death! Is this the handiwork of a supremely good and perfect God? Giv me, then, a devil for my king, even if I hav to tolerate a cloven hoof and a horn or two.

On the principle that "extremes often meet," I am not sure, after all, that a fine, full-fledged devil would not furnish the most promising candidate for the big chair on high!

Adding to the human the incalculable sum of brute (?) suffering, we hav a grand total terrible in its hideous deformity.

Throughout the animal kingdom we find it common for the powerful to kill and devour the weak.

"Every mouth is a slaughter-house, and every stomach a tomb," is literally true among many orders of animals.

If the above remarks regarding the ferocity of the lower (?) animals be true, how doubly true are they when applied to the pitiless tyrant, the arch-oppressor, man!

Brutes slay one another as a rule, with no more pain than is necessary to compass their ends; not that they shrink from inflicting pain, but that, unlike man, they commonly hav no desire to produce or gloat upon pain, for pain's sake.

Acute delight in producing and witnessing torture seems to be the proud (sic) prerogativ of Man!

I know whereof I speak in this matter, and shall prove the truth of my remarks, under the head of Vivisection, the atrocity and disgrace of Science.

THE END MAY JUSTIFY THE MEANS.

I will close this paper with a very brief examination of the above caption.

To say that the end may never justify the means is to claim that the surgeon who lacerates the limb to save the life is a criminal or a fool. He but inflicts a certain modicum of pain to attain a supposed greater good.

Who would be so illogical as to permit a thorn to fester in his flesh, because of the inconvenience attending its removal?

Such a man would justly be esteemed a fool.

The intellectualist cannot escape the conviction that all right and wrong is merely relativ.

Any specific act should be esteemed wrong, simply because it tends to increase the sum of suffering in the world.

This is, and can be, the only true gauge for determining what is right, and what wrong.

There is absolutely no act which mankind esteem a wrong but which might, under different (and perhaps most improbable) circumstances, become a right.

The above statement is sweeping, but reflection will fully justify it.

First: The aim of every sentient creature is to obtain happiness.

Second: To strive to attain it by the easiest means is wisdom.

Third: To judge correctly what may be this means is policy.

These three propositions embrace within their scope the entire ethics of right and wrong.

ELLIOT PRESTON.

Line upon Line.

No doubt there are many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to whom the discussion of prohibition has long ere this grown wearisome, as it certainly has to some of the disputants; but the conflict is irrepressible and the discussion is bound to go on, whether it pleases us or does not please us.

But it seems impossible to keep the champions of prohibition within the limits of argument and fair treatment of opponents. Elwood Chantler does not get within even rifled-cannon range of either, his whole letter being simply a tirade of abuse, a continued series of reflections upon the morals, alleged habits, and motivs of those who do not think as he does. Too diminutiv for further notice, though malignant enough, as most other little beings are, I dismiss him to the friendly oblivion from which he so prematurely emerged. "Liberta" says: "The attempt to represent this movement as one of a religious or tyrannical nature is not only absurd, but ridiculous. The keepers of dramshops are, in a majority of cases, members of the Roman Catholic church." From this, one would suppose (1) that one class of religionists had never been known to persecute another class; (2) that tyranny is not tyranny when visited upon Roman Catholics; and (3) that we are so oblivious to facts as to accept his assertion that prohibition is not essentially a church movement, both in principle and in leadership. To be sure, a few Liberals hav espoused it, but nine out of ten of the thoroughgoing, radical Freethinkers are either in the anti-prohibition ranks, or, if nominally prohibitionists, they are very distrustful of the rightfulness and efficacy of that which they faintly defend. My observation, extending principally over the states of Iowa and Kansas, has shown me that the Freethinkers are very rapidly deserting the sumptuary army. I know, personally, many Liberals who voted for the prohibition amendments in the states named, who, to-day, are strong anti-prohibitionists. The praying, preaching, psalm-singing people run the conventions and meetings gotten up in the interest of this reform, both in Kansas and Iowa. Nowhere else is the God-in-the-Constitution movement so persistently pushed as in Kansas, and in all their conventions there goes up a clamorous call for "national prohibition;" while Gov. St. John rises to say that "you cannot hav too much God-in-the-Constitution for me," and the prohibition conventions resolve that the Sunday laws should be enforced and Christian morality otherwise duly conserved.

Force-reform is the only kind of which the genuin Christian has any knowledge; prohibition is force-reform and, consequently, is essentially a Christian movement. "Liberta" tells us that prohibition is a success in Maine; Gov. St. John told the people of the East that it was a success in Kansas; we of Kansas know that it never was and is not now a success in this state, and we more than suspect that "Liberta" is no more accurate as a chronicler of contemporary facts than is John P. St. John. In confirmation of this reasonable suspicion, we hav the testimony of many reliable men who hav traveled in Maine, who aver that prohibition is not a success there in any sense of the term. E. C. WALKER.

"A Maine Man."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your paper of Oct. 27th appeared an article entitled, "Some Facts About Prohibition," copied from the New York Sun, the drift of which is that prohibition makes no difference in the amount of liquor drank, while the quality, on account of the prohibition, is villainous, "the vilest stuff purchasable," says this "Maine Man," and he trips along lightly, saying, the "latest effort to enforce the law in Bangor has proved an immense failure."

For this reason, he urges, there should be no such law, no law which is not enforced, or which is evaded. Delightful plan! Carry it out and many wholesome laws would be expunged from the statute books. Laws prohibitory of stealing are evaded every day. They should be repealed! Laws prohibitory of murder fail to prevent murder. Repeal them, as a matter of course.

"A Maine Man" tells us "there is less drunkenness in Bangor to-day than there used to be in prohibition times;" "the liquors are of a better quality, and they are drunk more moderately and more regularly."

And, doubtless, the drinkers are drunk more regularly, although he did not add that "fact" to his "figures."

"A Maine Man" declares, ecstatically, "Everybody seems satisfied with the present state of things."

As he took particular pains to say that his "facts" "are supported by figures," he would not overdraw a statement for the world—so conscientious! The likelihood is, nevertheless, that everybody is not satisfied, nor seems to be, with the present state of things. This man of "facts and figures" evidently forgot that he had said "many influential citizens" sent a remonstrance to the governor to hav the "law of prohibition enforced." Those are his own words. And to show that some of those influential citizens liv in Bangor, we will make him confess: "Three-quarters of the population would be pleased to hav the prohibitionists get down and out for good." Then there are prohibition people there. This "fact" plays havoc with his statement that "everybody seems satisfied" with the "two hundred open bars," in open defiance of law. Blessed city! "Everybody seems satisfied"—everybody! Satisfied because the liquors are not so poisonous, will not kill so speedily, and are "drunk more moderately and more regularly." Blissful Bangor! The only plague in it is a body of prohibitionists that its regular drinkers want to banish. It brings back to us the happy days when the innocent slave owner cursed the irrepressible abolitionists.

When the prohibitionists bear rule, this Maine man says, gambling dens, faro banks, multiply, not because they are in accordance with the principles of prohibition—the fiercest foe of prohibition does not dare to say that. Nevertheless, prohibition, in the peculiar logic of its enemies, is to blame for the woeful condition of gambling and all kinds of debauchery; it is the cause "directly or indirectly" of even bad whisky. This veracious "Maine Man" says that under the evil rule of prohibition "not a drop of liquor was consumed, but the liquor sold got to be the vilest stuff purchasable." The inference is that men drank liquor out of sheer spite, just to show the prohibitionists that they would drink anyway, and the meanest stuff at that. If that will not make every pesky prohibitionist hang his head in shame, and feel sort o' streaked, and never try to pass any more of his bad laws, what will?

At the present time, in Bangor, away down in Maine, where they hav "two hundred open bars," he says, the "men of Bangor will walk up manfully, as usual, and take their drinks." One bar, he says, during the fair sold five hundred dollars' worth of drinks in one day—a straight string of his "moderate and regular."

That is the way it is now; but when the prohibitionists were ruining the city, "men dodged in," he says, "by back doors, took drinks from 'bottle-holders'" and degraded women.

But now, when there are plenty of bars and multitudes of drinkers, he assures us "Bangor is to-day the most orderly of Maine's cities." But in Portland, he informs us, where prohibitory laws are in force, "wretched stuff was easily obtained." That is the way of it, you see; when men can walk up to open bars, the quality of whisky is good; but when they dodge into back doors, the rumsellers pour out the "vilest stuff purchasable," and thus strive to poison off their best and only faithful customers!

And this is their own version of it. The drinkers can see how the rumsellers love them. Such a story as this is its own condemnation, and scarcely needs comment. W. F. JAMIESON.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which you will continue my subscription to your paper.

I still say, Hurrah for T. Winter and Otto Wettstein. They hav got the right sow by the ear; hold on. Things that begin must end. BASCO, ILL., Dec. 4. 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed in this registered letter $3.25, for one year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and one dozen copies of "False Claims," by John E. Remsburg. I hav been a subscriber to Mr. Bennett's paper from Vol. I, No. 1; paid my subscription regularly in advance, and never missed one number. I hav several of his books, and prize them very much.

My best wishes for the success of the paper and of its editor and manager. JOHN DIDIER.

OAKLAND, CAL., Dec. 3, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed post-office order for $2.50, for my paper another year. I see I am a little behind, but what can be done about it? I can hardly be reconciled to the fact that D. M. Bennett has passed away; it seems such a short time since he called and took dinner with us, and we thought he was good for twenty years or more. Our League is doing pretty well. The attendance at the Sunday evening meetings averages about forty persons. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly,

A. H. SCHOW.

ARCADIA, OHIO, Dec. 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I see the time of my subscription is past, and you hav been sending the best paper in the world without my subscription renewed, for which I thank you. I shall send you the subscription fee soon. Times are close with me at present. I wish every man, woman, and child liked your paper as well as I do. This is a church-ridden town of about three hundred people, and it has three churches. I hav been showing THE TRUTH SEEKER to some of them, and think if there was a good Liberal talker here he could do some good. FRANK KLINE.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS, Dec. 4, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: In reading my friend, THE TRUTH SEEKER, this evening, it just popped in my mind that my subscription runs out on the 14th of this month. To obviate even the bare possibility of its being suspended, I hasten to put up the requisit. I mailed an order this morning for the "Apocryphal." My friends, knowing that the first copy has gone forth on its mission of evangelization, are just howling for another copy. So send it promptly; and allow me to waft you my best wishes.

As ever yours in Liberalism, D. T. ROSS.

PALATKA, FLA., NOV. 21, 283.

MR. EDITOR: A little while ago you were kind enough to send me a "sample copy." Although not on your books, I read and pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly. It comes to our house in the name of another member of the family. After being read at home, the numbers are generally distributed where they will do the most good.

These Florida sands are very barren, both literally and figurativly. They will usually "sprout peas," but the seeds of freedom and Freethought very rarely take root in this soil, be they scattered never so carefully. For the deep down root of all things,

EAST DES MOINES, IOWA, Dec. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I observe, by the reminder on my most cherished and valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, that the time for me to remit is due for some time. I hope you will excuse my delay in not doing so sooner; circumstances will not allow me to do as I would like to, It is hard to think that the world, which is the only home we ever knew, should so persist in doing so great a wrong. Des Moines, like many others, is building up temples to the unknown God; there are superstitious people here like many other places; the fanatic zealots, or divines, as they are pleased to be called, are continually ding-donging on the same old dogma, "Believe or be damned;" but, thanks to THE TRUTH SEEKER, the bottom is knocked out of hell long ago.

There are a good many, for all that, that are doing their own thinking, as the sequel will show. When the great runaway in India from our champion, D. M. Bennett, was here, some months ago, delivering a lecture on the "Seven Wonders," the renegade, Joe Cook, did not get as warm a welcome as he would like to; the Young Men's Christian Association being the only ones that gave him a show at all, as the balance of the audience hissed him. However, he took the liberty to tell them that it was only geese that hissed. In all, his reception was a failure, he will not be back here again in a hurry.

Please find inclosed post-office order for $3 25—$2.75 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; twenty-five cents for D. M. Bennett's "Answers to Christians Questions." and "Ecce Diabolus." Yours, G. E. WARD.

A TRANSCRIPT FROM MY DIARY.

DOWLIN, TEXAS.

I, John A. Rutherford, of Lamar county, state of Texas, a seeker and lover of truth, hoping to liv forever and progress in happiness, was born into this life January 31, 1799, and write this epitaph August 6, A.D. 1882. I feel bound to say that I do not believe that the blood of Jesus Christ was ever any benefit to any person. I do not rely on that blood for any service it can be to me. I should feel that I was a rascal to wish the blood of an innocent man to pay my debt. But God never instituted such a cruel, unjust system. It is nothing but rank heathenism. I believe that Jesus was a very good and morally courageous man, but no God. Amen. Amen.

JOHN A. RUTHERFORD.

NOTE.—My surviving friends are instructed to add the date of my death to the above, and hav it on my tombstone.

WHEELING, Dec. 2, 1883.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, HUMANTY'S BEST FRIEND.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me a small space to put upon record a few stray thoughts in connection with one of nature's truest and noblest sons, Robert G. Ingersoll. The world has produced in different ages and centuries many noble, pure, and conscientious men and women, men and women though, who had but one hobby, so to speak—in common parlance, fanatics; but who, nevertheless, were actuated by the best of motivs. I repeat, the world has produced a considerable number of such men and women; and whilst, too, all due praise should be accorded to all of those pure, conscientious, one idea'd persons, yet there is always a void to be filled by grander, loftier minds, who hav occupied and still do, a wider field of thought—a pre-eminence of talent combined with the same degree of conscientiousness. These names, though, hav been but few, comparativly speaking. And among some of the number, ancient and modern, conspicuous in history, are the names of Copernicus, Bruno, Galileo, Comte, Humboldt, Voltaire, Rousseau, Spencer, Darwin, Draper, Paine, Kneeland, Bennett, Wakeman, Seaver, Wright, and last of all on this starry list, and who to-day, stands preeminent among his compeers, is the bold, daring, and dauntless orator, Col. R. G. Ingersoll. Now, Mr. Editor, perhaps you and the readers of your paper may claim that this gush of praise is a little too extravagant. I trust though that your decision may be held in reserve until I finish this article. A great amount of reformers hav the ability, but a smaller number hav the courage to grapple with (as has Mr. Ingersoll), not only clerical abuses, but also political abuses. Not only has he snubbed the supreme authority of the church, but also the supreme authority of the government. When the war for the Union was ended, and the black man was recognized as a part and parcel of the government, it was thought best that he should be protected; therefore, to that end, a civil rights bill was passed very strongly over a veto from the chief executiv of the nation. Not one lawyer in a hundred then pretended to deny that it was fairly constitutional, that its validity could be questioned. And when the question came up some time after in the lower courts, and was decided against one side or the other, I don't just recollect which, it was taken to the supreme court, there to be adjudicated. These cases hav been pending for years before that august body, and just lately has the court announced its decision—and that, too, adverse to the colored citizen. In a word, after four years of bloody warfare, the colored man's civil status remains the same almost as in the palmy days of slavery. This dastardly and unjust decision no one dared to confront with more alacrity than the noble and brave patriot, Robert G Ingersoll. Not an appeal, though, was it, to the baser passions of the colored people, but a calm, eloquent, and dignified mien in its burst of indignation which carried conviction to the hearts of the people. I hav read his appeal and arraignment of that august body of blockheads, the supreme court, and concur with him, "that, if this decision is law, then the war for the Union was a crime against the Southern people." And when he summed it up as being equal to and as barbarous as the Dred Scott decision, I thanked that father and mother for bringing forth such an illustrious and worthy son. Shall such an illustrious citizen as this, one who has proved his devotion to a down-trodden and depraved race; one who has spent a life time, almost, in acts of charity; one who has dared to stand up for the rights of labor; one who has pleaded eloquently for the cause of reason against superstition, thereby opening up a way for the average mind to discern the falsities, contradictions and absurdities of the so-called holy Bible—I ask shall such a mind, such an intellect, such a massiv brain be clouded in obscurity, like Paine, Voltaire, Diderot, and many others, simply because he stands out against the popular theology of the day? Oh, no; such cannot or will not be the case. Impossible! Let us rather hope that those mighty intellects who hav gone before hav opened up the road and made it possible that such men as Ingersoll, Bennett, Seaver, Putnam, and a host of others may lie down to sleep with a laurel wreath entwined around their brows. Let us trust that the days of persecution are over; that the honest, the good of this generation may find a warm reception at the hands of the next generation. Certainly the signs of the times indicate this, if there is anything in evolution or reformation. Fifty years ago, your noble sheet, THE TRUTH SEEKER, would hav been suppressed, and its editor mobbed and stoned if the same kind of literature had been allowed to fill its columns as is now published. Thanks, then, to the men and women who hav dared the hisses of abuse which hav been showered upon their devoted heads. Hoping that you may giv this a place in your valuable paper, I remain as ever an implacable foe to superstition and despotism, OCTAVIUS J. BROSIUS.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed postal note for $2.50 and renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I take several papers, but THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only one that tells me what the world is thinking about, and the only one I get ideas from. It is an intellectual luxury that I cannot do without. Long may it liv to combat priestcraft and superstition. Fraternally and truly yours,

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 284, and the balance to use toward paying for work on the monument, which I am pleased to learn has been erected, to the memory of our beloved brother, D. Fraternally yours, E. M. SICKMON.

MORRISONVILLE, ILL., Dec. 11, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2.75—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and 25 cents for "The Truth Seeker Annual." And now I introduce to you Brother Riley as a new subscriber. He has been a faithful reader of your paper ever since I hav taken it, and he cannot do without it. We are a band of Infidels. We hav cornered the parson of our neighborhood. I am going away from here, and you need not send the paper till I notify you, after the 1st of January. Some will bear witness to the fact that I hav worked hard for liberty, and expect to spend the remainder of my days in the good cause of freeing men and women from priestcraft.

CLEVELAND, Dec. 3, 283 A.S.

MR. EDITOR: At our last League meeting it was decided to hold our meeting hereafter at 2 o'clock P.M. (90th meridian) railroad standard time. The Hon. A. B. Bradford will lecture to the League next Sunday. John E. Remsburg will be here soon. I am very glad to read of so much interest being manifested in the preparations for celebrating the anniversary of Paine's birth. It is a move I am very much interested in, and one that will dispel the dark and false cloud that has been thrown over his name and life by the clergy of this country. I think possibly our society will endeavor to do something to bring about this vindication of our (everybody's) hero's name. The tide of popular thought is tending that direction, and if we accelerate it our great author and hero will be vindicated; and it will be considered no disgrace by our neighbors to be a Freethinker, or to express our thoughts freely. I sincerely hope the time will come soon. I see by your last paper that you are publishing an Annual. I will order one soon. And when it is published, if you will send me a few copies, I will endeavor to sell them for you to the League members. I wish you would change the notice of our meeting in your paper, stating 2 o'clock P.M. standard railroad time, or thirty-three minutes slower than city meridian time. I will also distribute any circulars of your books that you may wish among the members of our society. W. J. IRVINE, Secretary.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: While I dislike to say that one dish is better than another, where all are prepared with skill and taste, I think the papers over the names of Mr. Bradford and Mr. Remsburg, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 3d, are as good of the kind as I hav seen on the same subject, the facts and proof are presented in such direct and plain language, like all from their minds and pens. Both the papers are admirable. Mr. Remsburg's "False Claims" is as good in its way as Charles Sumner's "Barbarism of Slavery;" and "The Barbarisms of the Church" would hav been a fitting title.

Mr. Bradford could hav added the Oneida Community. Its founder was a Presbyterian preacher, and Guiteau was a convert, a pupil, and a graduate of that institution—a gigantic brothel claiming and receiving protection as Christians, under Art. 1, Sec. 3, of the constitution of the state of New York. It is thus apparent that vice, immorality, and crime, if done in the name of religion, hav a warrant and sanction from the church and state.

J. VAN AMBURGH.

GRAND LEDGE, MICH., Dec. 9, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been interested in the reply of S. P. Putnam to Mr. Andrews, in the three last numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I think his arguments scientific, and that they demonstrate facts—excepting what he says about his five senses. I think I hav observed six senses in persons and animals. The one Mr. Putnam left out is thinking. To illustrate: I think I feel, etc. I observe a person; I know he is thinking by his condition and the movements he makes. I know he has a sense of feeling by the movements he makes when he gets hurt. And so on with the six senses.

I will now state what I think is the matter. The priests hav been called teachers for a long time. Instead of teaching, they hav stolen our sense of thinking and called it soul, or spirit. These are words without any meaning, and they cannot be defined any more than God, or devil, or heaven, or hell. They hav taught us that the soul is the immortal spirit—which cannot be defined. Is it any wonder that people act so foolishly with five senses and the sense of thinking left out, which is the most necessary to get along with here among such teachers as we hav had? The priests' easy times are passing away; the people are thinking for themselvs. I think the handwriting is discovered by many people, and that the priests ought to be turned out to grass—as they assert Nebuchadnezzar was—and let them grub for a living. Yours respectfully,

HARRISON HALBERT.

PACIFIC, Dec. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav for the last three weeks received two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The extra paper is no loss. I put it out on duty; and if there is no addition of new subscribers from this place, and has been none, let me assure you that it is no fault of mine. To increase its circulation is and has been my great desire as well as yours, for it givs expression to my own thoughts and ideas more than any other paper.

I see that you are going to issue a "Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinker's Almanac" for 1884. I think I shall hav one. If you will send me a copy, I will try and get some more to take them.

That E.M. 284 I don't like. 107 A.N. suits me better, and is, I think, more entitled to the honor. I don't see or understand why the Liberals of the nation should go for their idol to Rome—to the Roman church—its offspring. If Bruno had the courage to proclaim the new astronomy, the true solar system, the infinity of heavens and of worlds, he had not the courage to proclaim the rights of man, the infinit cruelty of his God and church; nor free speech, nor Freethought doctrins. Science may be proud of him, with its "new heaven and a new earth"—on paper. But where the new heaven and the new earth for man may be, I hav not yet found out. It is not in Europe, it is not in Asia, it is not in Africa; it is not here, in our own great and glorious country, that Paine wrote for, Washington fought for, Jefferson and many other great and whole-souled men talked for, and thousands bled and died for. All that was for man, sir, for his condition, for his right, for his heaven, and not only for cold science, which has but little in it which givs man that which he most needs. That, sir, is my idea about the Bruno era. I am not a writer nor a talker on paper, like Wakeman or Putnam; for if I was, if I had free speech—that is, if I were free to express my thoughts, such as they are, I would call their attention to several ideas which they uphold, and are mistaken. But yet, in regard to the Nine Demands of Liberalism, we are one, but I at the same time object to that seventh plank, as a demand of Liberalism, most emphatically.

I am no temperance fanatic either.

I hav said more than I intended, but hope that I hav said only what is true, and that my intentions may not be misconstrued.

I remain, truly and sincerely, your friend and well-wisher, AUG. H. KRUGER.

ST. CATHERINE'S, ONT., Dec. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I will send you a few lines for your valuable paper. I was born in 1814, in a little log hut in the forest, and raised on a farm. My parents were poor, and they taught me to work quite young. Our schoolhouse was at some distance, and the old Webster's spelling-book was about the only one from which the children were taught, generally by a poorly-read teacher. The younger children were not taught writing or figures, and English grammar was not heard of by them. So you see we could learn very little, and further, our parents were against much learning, saying we could read the Bible, and that was enough. By this you may know the children were brought up in the grossest ignorance and superstition which was so firmly rooted in their plastic minds that it seems almost impossible to eradicate it, even after mature years. Young as I then was, there was an aching void in my mind that longed for literature and knowledge, but this my parents were hard against, thinking it was wicked. I continued to work until I verged toward manhood, when a Bible came into our house, and I read it, but it was not interesting to me, but I found it agreed exactly with the ignorant and superstitious traditional doctrins that my parents had taught me all this time. I hav since regretted very much that I ever read the Bible, as it only filled my mind with visionary ignorance, instead of useful knowledge. I stayed at home and kept close at hard work, with my mind longing for literature. But nothing came to relieve it until I was twenty years of age, when I got a book on botany, and, years after, some on chemistry, physiology, natural philosophy, astronomy, the philosophy of digestion, and some of Combe's works on physical and moral physiology and phrenology. Oh, what a rich feast were these to my ignorant mind! Why? Because they taught me realities. All was now as clear to my mind as a cloudless sky. Oh, how beautiful!—laws that govern all substances, material and aerial, laws that harmonize with nature, laws that are immutable and invariable in their operation. My mind was now easy, but not quite free, because the preceding authors, after expounding the laws of nature so well that any rational being could understand them, still linked them with the supernatural laws which are contrary to and subversiv of nature's harmonious laws. These we know are true, because we see them verified by observation and experience. But the supernatural laws, as believed by the ignorant Bible-readers, hav never been confirmed within the memory of an intelligent and rational being. Up to 1882 I did not see any author outspoken enough to sever this link, until a Liberal friend here gave me THE TRUTH SEEKER, after reading which my mind was fully replenished, satisfied, and forever free. I was so well pleased with it that I at once sent $3.00 for it. At that time it was doubly interesting to me, having, before I was ruined, made a tour around the globe myself, and passed through many of those countries and cities, and over those seas and streams described in our hero's letters that were published in your paper.

But, oh, how I was shocked, after reading his paper so short a time, to see it announced that D. M. Bennett was no more! Yes, it was even mentally painful to me, and I wished it had been a dream; but alas! it was too true. That a noble-minded man of such extraordinary powers and abilities—such a cool, clear, logical, and philosophical reasoner—with a good constitution, should pass away when only a little past the prime of life, evidently proves that his system must hav been undermined when he was imprisoned by those lying, low-minded, hypocritical, brutish, and devilish scoundrels, who did their meanest to ruin him. I do not think that one could find in the filthiest slums of the most degraded city on this globe, animals in human shape—and they even trained in the lowest sinks of iniquity—that would, or even could, serve D. M. Bennett, a philosopher of honesty, integrity, and really substantial worth, as did those base, despicable villains, who did their best, not only to crush, but to annihilate the noble martyr's good works. And what hav those puny, fiendish imps, after exhausting all their malice, gained? Nothing. They hav lost heavily, made converts to the hero's philosophy, and, so long as they persist in their meanness, will make many more.

Rational men and women of honor and integrity whose minds are replenished with philosophy and useful knowledge, will ever be pleased to meet those of like intelligence, but will always dread the very unpleasant ordeal of coming in contact with those who hav grown up in lowest slums of ignorance and supernatural superstition, and who stubbornly refuse to be enlightened.

Mr. Editor, I hav just fairly begun, but I must stop short. Before doing so, however, I must tell you that my organization is such that fair words from men and women, upon slight and insufficient evidence, too readily lead me to believe that all are honest, and by that means I hav been ruined. My little money, which I got by hard work only, I gave to a St. Catherine's lawyer (in whom, after hearing his fair promises, I placed implicit confidence) to invest for me, but he proved to be a liar, embezzler, and sneak thief, and thus ruined me. And his partner (in whom I also had confidence), who is a strict Methodist, and the leader of a choir, helped to accomplish my ruin. My small means being gone, I am compelled to work again, after passing sixty-nine years. But, ruined as I am, so long as I can earn enough money honestly, I will send it in advance for THE TRUTH SEEKER, in December, each and every year while I liv. Inclosed you will find $5—$2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and $2.50 for the Monument Fund. I will send you some more material for your paper soon. Yours ever for the good cause of sobriety, integrity, and universal freedom of mind.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Full River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

My Boyhood.

BY J. G. SAXE.

Ah me! the joyous days are gone!
I little dreamt till they were flown
How fleeting were the hours!
For, lest we break the pleasing spell,
Time bears for youth a muffled bell,
And hides his face in flowers.

Ah! well I mind me of the days,
Still bright in memory's flattering rays,
When all was fair and new;
When knaves were only found in books,
And friends were known by friendly looks,
And love was always true.

While yet of sin I scarcely dreamed,
And everything was what it seemed,
And all too bright for choice;
When fays were wont to guard my sleep,
And Crusoe still could make me weep,
And Santa Claus rejoice.

When heaven was pictured to my thought
(In spite of all my mother taught Of happiness serene),
A theater of boyish plays—
One glorious round of holidays,
Without a school between.

I Follow Cheerfully.

Conduct me, Zeus, and thou, O Destiny.
Wherever your decrees hav fixed my lot,
I follow cheerfully; and did I not,
Wicked and wretched, I must follow still.

Ezekiel's Silver Spoon.

A CHRISTMAS STORY.

"Zekiel! Ezekiel! Come here this minute! D'ye hear? Ezekiel!"

"Yes, I hear; I'm coming!"—and a tow-headed boy of eleven or twelve years came bounding into the room, mentally ejaculating at the same time, "I wonder what old Mother Twiddle Twaddle wants now!"

Mrs. Bangs stood with uplifted hand as the boy entered, as if quite ready to pounce upon him and inflict some premeditated assault upon his inoffensiv head. She had a grim visage, and a fierce, greenish-gray eye, that was not at all prepossessing, or calculated to win the heart of a youngster like Ezekiel, who was a bright lad, full of fun, and, sometimes, mischief. Left an orphan at an early age, he had been "bound out" till he was twenty-one to the Bangses. He had been born in the lap of wealth and luxury, but, reverses falling upon his parents, their property and means were swept away. Death soon took them, the mother first, who had been always delicate, and then the father, who could not recover from the shock that the loss of his wealth gave him, and the still greater and more terrible loss of his devoted wife, the mother of Ezekiel, the dear boy who was the child of their old age. Ezekiel's mother had a son by a former marriage, a young man grown when Ezekiel was born, but he went away to Calcutta and nobody knew what had become of him, so Ezekiel was quite alone with the exception of an old uncle and some cousins, who didn't care whether he lived or died. If Mrs. Bangs had not taken him he would very likely hav been placed in the poor-house, a fact that she did not forget to impress upon his mind daily. He was employed as "chore boy," and there were always plenty of chores to do in the Bangs family. He had little opportunity to play, and was frequently beaten and banged by the members of the household, except little Olive, who was a twin to Crawford, and while Crawford never forgot to tease and insult him, Olive let no chance pass by to speak a kind word to him, or do him some little favor, for which he was truly grateful. Of all the effects of his own home, which had been sold under the auctioneer's hammer, Ezekiel had saved one silver spoon. It had been in the family of his mother a long time, and was of peculiar make and workmanship. It had been brought, originally, from England, and was engraved with the name of his grandfather, his mother's father, John Draper.

Aunt Judith, a colored nurse who had been in the family a long time, slipped it into his bosom the morning of the auction sale, saying:

"Keep dis, chile, for good luck, an' doan ye nebber—no, nebber, part wid it. O honey! my ole heart jes' bleeds for ye, it do, sure. I jes' wish I could take ye in dese yere ole arms an' fly away wid ye to hebben, or somewares outen dis yere sinful ole world, wid its crooked ole ways!"

So Ezekiel kept his silver spoon with implicit faith that it would some day bring him good luck, as Aunt Judith prophesied.

But to return to the morning in question, when he was summoned so peremptorily into the presence of Mrs. Bangs.

"Do you see that milk there, with the cream all lapped off? What did you shut the cat up in the buttery for?" and Mrs. Bangs stamped her foot.

"I didn't."

"You did."

"No, ma'am."

"I'll teach you to contradict me, you good-for-nothing poorhouse rascal, you! This comes of taking care of poor o' the town trash;" and with that she boxed the boy's ears savagely. "You knew the minister and his wife were to be here to tea to-night, and I wanted to save the cream for the waffies. Take that! and that! and that!" and Ezekiel's cheeks grew redder and redder beneath the cruel blows. "Now go and blacken Crawford's shoes; d'ye hear?

"Yes'm."

"And see that you shine 'em up bright, too," bawled Crawford from another room.

"Really, Crawford, I think you ought to shine your own shoes. It's too bad to make Ezekiel wait upon you so," and Olive looked the indignation that she felt.

"What! I blacken my shoes! I'm a gentleman, I am, ain't I mother?"

"Yes, my son."

"And Zeke is just right to blacken a gentleman's shoes, ain't he, mother?"

"Yes, dear."

"If I were a gentleman I'd act like one," said Olive, bending over her work.

While these remarks were being made, Ezekiel, with smarting ears, went to work putting a polish on Crawford's best shoes, and while he worked he thought:

"Cream for ministers, and skimmed milk for other folks! No milk at all for me! I'd as lief the cat would eat the cream as the minister. He never speaks to me when he comes here, but is always praising and patting Crawford. Ain't I a boy like him? Ain't I as good as he is? Havn't I feelings? How would his mother like him to be kicked, cuffed, and banged about same as I am, I should like to know? Her name is Bangs, and maybe that's the reason she knows how to bang so well," and the tears in Ezekiel's eyes were replaced by a merry twinkle.

"I'm not afraid of old Mother Twiddle Twaddle, if she does box my ears. O dear, I suppose I oughtn't to call her names, for she is Olive's mother, and Olive is good to me."

You may believe Ezekiel did not hav a very pleasant life at the Bangs mansion. Crawford tormented him in various ways, and when he appealed to Mr. or Mrs. Bangs they only laughed at his complaints, thus encouraging their son in his bad conduct. But Olive resented Crawford's treatment of Ezekiel, and took sides with the poor orphan; thereby frequently incurring the displeasure of her parents and brother. Ezekiel was always hopeful, and looked forward to better times. He often looked at his silver spoon, and wondered if it ever would bring him good fortune. He kept it bright and shining, and now and then he would giv it a rub, and then look all around to see if some good genie would not appear, as Olive had told him such a being did come to Aladdin when he rubbed his wonderful lamp, in the story. But his sober second thought told him there were no genii, only the genii of good conduct, integrity, uprightness, and perseverance. His silver spoon was like a talisman, nevertheless, to him, and always seemed to whisper, somehow, of better days. He cherished it fondly, too, as the only memento he possessed of his dear mother. One day he came rushing down the stairs, and ran headlong, in his excitement, against Mr. Bangs.

"Here, here, you, sir! What's this! What's this? You young pot-black, what's the rumpus?"

"O sir!" exclaimed Ezekiel, "hav you—seen—O dear!—my spoon?—my silver spoon? It is gone," he sobbed, "gone, and I can't find it anywhere. Oh, I am so lonesome without it! It was all I had. O dear, dear!" and he burst into an uncontrolable fit of weeping.

"Well, well, well, I must say! And how did you come by a silver spoon, now, I should like to know? Poorhouse folks don't hav silver spoons, do they?"

"O sir, please, it was my mother's spoon, it was, and it was in my room, under my straw pillow. I always kept it there, and now it has gone."

"Oh, ho! you don't accuse me of stealing it, do you? Ha, ha, ha!" and Mr. Bangs laughed so loudly that the whole family came to see what was the matter, and, when informed, they made light of it, and ridiculed poor Ezekiel for having a silver spoon. Crawford, especially, made a great deal of sport of the matter.

"Maybe you wanted us to think you were born with a silver spoon in your mouth, Zeke! Oh, ho, ho; he, he, he; hi, hi, hi! I declare I shall split my sides laughing—'tis such a joke!"

Mr. Bangs said such a boy should not be allowed to hav a silver spoon, anyway—that an iron one was good enough for him. But Olive said: "Never mind, Ezekiel. There's a silver lining to every cloud, and who knows but that your spoon has gone to make a lining somehow to the clouds over your head."

"That's very pretty and romantic, Olive, but it doesn't bring back my spoon," said he, sorrowfully.

That night he sat brooding over the kitchen fire, and Topsy, the great black cat, sat close by him, washing her face. Presently she jumped up in his lap, and looked wistfully in his face.

"I don't see how I can stand it to liv here," he thought. "I wish I knew what to do!" and in the intensity of his wish, he gave Topsy a squeeze.

"R-ow-u, ah-we-ow!" said Topsy, in cat language, which Ezekiel interpreted thus: "Run away!"

"When shall I go, Topsy?" and he squeezed her again.

"E-ow-n, th— spree-ing!" and Topsy jumped down and ran under the stove.

"She said, 'In the spring,' I do believe," laughed Ezekiel, quite elated to think he had fancied the cat could giv him such advice, which, however, he resolved to take if he should liv until the spring-time. Time wore on, and nothing was heard of the lost spoon, though Olive assured him that, in some way, it would come to light again—but how, she could not tell; she only felt that it was not lost for good.

Christmas was drawing near, and everybody was busy preparing for a season of jollity and good cheer. It was not a merry looking forward to for Ezekiel, for he had to work so much the harder and longer, and had nothing to expect nor anything to giv. He would like—oh, so much!—to hav skates and books, and all the good things that delight a boy's heart; but these things were not for him. Crawford had them—he had everything he wanted, and more besides, and the more he had the more selfish he seemed to grow.

About this time a man was seen to pause suddenly before the window of a second-hand store. After gazing a while, he opened the door and went in. For days afterward he was seen in company with the coarse, ill-favored proprietor of the shop, on street corners, up-town and down-town, interviewing this one and that one, visiting stores, offices, and schools. After visiting the high-school and talking with the teacher, always accompanied by the second-hand storekeeper, he smiled and went away satisfied, apparently. It was Christmas Eve, and there came a sharp ring of the bell at the door of the Bangs mansion. Ezekiel, whose duty it was to attend the door, opened it, and three gentlemen stood upon the marble step, one of whom said he wished to speak with Mr. Bangs and his son Crawford.

Ezekiel ushered them into the library and went back to his old place in the kitchen, but in a short time he was summoned to the library.

One of the gentlemen, gazing at him long and, as it seemed, almost lovingly, inquired: "What is your name?"

"Ezekiel Brown," was the low reply.

"Did you ever see this before?" and the man held up a silver spoon.

"It is my spoon!—O my spoon, my spoon!" screamed Ezekiel.

"How do you know it is?" sternly demanded Mr. Bangs.

"I know by its workmanship, and on the back is my grandfather's name engraved—'John Draper,'" gasped Ezekiel.

"So it is," said the gentleman, turning the spoon over, that all might see. "I am Lester Knowles, your half brother, come from the East Indies, all the way, to find and love you;" and he clasped Ezekiel in his arms. "Ah," he said, "I should know you anywhere, for I see our poor mother's looks in your eyes and face."

The Bangs family sat aghast at the turn things had taken, and they turned as white as marble when one of the other gentlemen, who was an officer, produced a warrant for the arrest of Crawford for stealing Ezekiel's spoon. The other was the man who had bought the spoon of Crawford, but who did not learn his name, yet had no difficulty in identifying him when he was discovered in school. Ezekiel begged that Crawford might be let off, since he had found not only his spoon, but a dear brother, who had come to share his home and property with him. Lester Knowles had sought everywhere, but could not find Ezekiel till, seeing the spoon in the window, he recognized it immediately, and thus obtained the clue that revealed his whereabouts. An uncle had died in England recently, and Lester and Ezekiel were the only heirs to his wealth, so that they were both very rich.

"What will you hav for a Christmas present?" inquired Lester, gazing at Ezekiel fondly, after they had taken up their quarters at the hotel.

"I hav the best Christmas present already," he answered. "I hav a brother—and my dear old silver spoon," he added. "But I would like to giv a present," he said, bashfully, after a pause.

"Well, name it."

"I would like to giv Olive something; she was so good to me always. And I want to find Aunt Judith, too."

Olive was presented with a beautiful diamond ring, and I shouldn't if that were supplemented by a wedding ring one of these days. Crawford and his parents tried to creep around and be friendly with Ezekiel, but they had been weighed in the balances and found wanting, and Ezekiel repelled them, kindly but effectually.

Aunt Judith was sought and found, and was as delighted as a child at the good fortune of her former pet.

"I done tole ye, honey, dat spoon 'ud fetch ye good luck. I knowed it, an' it comed jess as I thought. Dese yere old eyes kin see, chile, a long ways in de dark. Massa Lesser, Ise born wid a wail on my face—I was; an' I kin see, I kin."

"You couldn't see where Ezekiel was, though," laughed Lester.

"Oh, I knowed you'd fine him out. It didn't 'quire me to see dat, Massa Lesser."

Aunt Judith was made comfortable in a little home of her own, and never ceases to be thankful she had the foresight "to put dat siller spoon in de chile's bosom." And Ezekiel thanks his lucky stars that his spoon returned to him with such good fortune, and that he did not hav to run away, after all, as the cat told him.

Poetry.

To Christ.

From the Freethinker.

Across the centuries, O lamb of God!
We look to thee,
And watch thine agonized and wretched death
Upon the tree;
What hast thou done for frail humanity
By all that strife?
The poor result of struggle and of death—
A wasted life!

All thy high-sounding titles—Christ, Messiah,
The Savior, God,
Mean nothing—thou didst never wield o'er man
A chastening rod;
Peace hast thou brought us here? No peace hav we,
But fearful slaughter.
For in thy name foul men hav ever shed
Our blood like water.

And wert thou God? O weak omnipotence,
To die such death!
Infinitly conditioned, mighty God
Drawing men's breath!
Mad wert thou then? Fanatic certainly
If son of man;
If man and God—then weak and poor as thy Atonement plan.

Great truly thou wert not, nor couldst thou be
With such a heart—
So faint and weak, and lacking in the main
The nobler part.
Did I believe that thou hadst power to save
Mankind from "hell,"
I'd curse thee as a tyrant—from the heavens
None worse e'er fell.

But wert thou simply man! Poor carpenter,
Poor peasant-priest—
Ignorant, mad; but that is over now,
All suffering ceased!
Then pass away, we giv thee many a tear,
We pity thee;
And in our time, commit thy best offense
Of blasphemy.

Farewell to thee! and with thy name shall die
The name of God,
Father and son, and spirit stain no more
Earth's sea or sod.
No God we need, no Christ, no after death—
Eternity!
All these are passing. Serve and worship now
Humanity? ALFRED R. ANDREWS.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 8m8

THE DANISH CURE EXPLAINED

BY WILHELMINE D. SCHOTT,

Practitioner of the Danish Cure.

WITH PORTRAIT OF AUTHOR.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

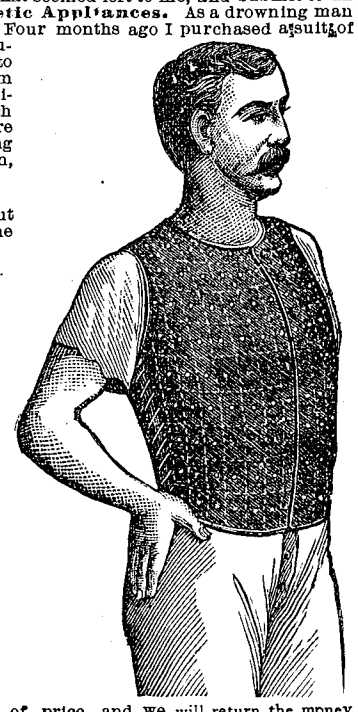
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders; and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished and unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

DR. FELLOWS

A REGULARLY educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove,

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Gems of Thought.

OF course a man will accept the evidence of persons with whom he is acquainted, and whom he knows to be men of veracity; when they make a statement that is probable, that is not impossible, but from this it does not follow that he should believe persons wholly unknown to him when they proclaim utter impossibilities.—D. M. Bennett.

THEOLOGIES, rubrics, surplices, church articles, and this enormous, ever-repeated thrashing of straw—a world of rotten straw, thrashed all into powder, filling the universe and blotting out the stars and worlds. Heaven pity you with such a threshing-floor for world and its draggled, dirty farthing-candle for sun! There is surely other worship possible for the heart of man. There should be other work, or none at all, for the intellect and executiv faculty of man.—Carlyle's Life of John Sterling.

PERHAPS the most conspicuous instance of the power of preconception in deciding the sense of holy writ is the traditional interpretation of the Song of Solomon. In this little book, which is altogether secular in its subject and its nature, the love of a young damsel to her swain is described in peculiarly plain and sensuous language. But precisely because it was so plain was it necessary to find allegorical allusions under the rather glowing phrases. Hence such expressions as "let him kiss me with a kiss of his mouth; thy caresses are softer than wine," are held to refer to "the church's love unto Christ," and an enthusiastic encomium passed by the Shunamite upon the physical perfections of her lover is called a "description of Christ by his graces." So, when another speaker, in this case a man, flatters a woman by enumerating the beauties of her form, the feet, the joints of her thighs, the navel, the belly, the two breasts so passionately praised by her admirer, are thought in some mystic way to signify the graces of the church. A passage referring to a young girl not yet fully developed is made out to be a foreshadowing of "the calling of the gentiles," and the natural and simple appeal to the lover to make haste to come is "the church praying for Christ's coming" —Amberley's Analysis.

WHISTON, the translator of Josephus, boldly affirms the song of songs to be a dissolute love-song, composed by Solomon when advanced in years and dissolute in practice, and that, consequently, it ought to be excluded from the canon of the sacred books.—Horne's Introduction.

IT is said to be a wicked thing, and contrary to human nature, for a man to say that he wouldn't care if, after his own death, a general conflagration of the whole world were to happen; so it is certainly true that men ought to consult the interests of those that are to come after us, for the sake of the love we bear them.—Cicero on Good and Evil.

LET a bear robbed of her whelps meet a man rather than a fool in his folly.—Proverbs xvii, 17.

THE present is our scene of action—the future is for speculation and for trust. We firmly believe that man was sent upon the earth to liv in it, to enjoy it, to study it, to love it, to embellish it—to make the most of, in short. It is his country, on which he should lavish his affections and his efforts. It should be to him a house, not a tent—a home, not a school. If when this house and this home are taken from him, Providence, in its wisdom and its bounty, provides him with another, let him be deeply grateful for the gift—let him transfer to that future, when it has become his present, his exertions, his researches, and his love. But let him rest assured that he is sent into this world, not to be constantly hankering after, dreaming of, preparing for another world which may, or may not, be in store for him—but to do his duty and fulfil his destiny on earth—to do all that lies in his power to improve it, to render it a scene of elevated happiness to himself, to those around him, and to those that come after him.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

O DEATH, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possession, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things; yea, unto him that is yet able to receive meat! O Death, acceptable is thy sentence unto the needy and unto him whose strength faileth, that is now in the last age, and is vexed with all things, and to him that despaireth and hath lost patience.—Eccl. xli, 1, 2.

THE grand doctrin that every human being should hav the means of self-culturing, of progress in knowledge and virtue, of health, comfort, and happiness, of exercising the powers and affections of a man; this is slowly taking its place, as the highest social truth. That the world was made for all and not for a few; that society is to care for all; that no human being shall perish but through his own faults; that the great end of government is to spread a shield over the rights of all—these propositions are growing into axioms, and the spirit of them is coming forth in all the departments of life.—Dr. Channing's Present Age.

Odds and Ends.

THE polecat is supposed to hav been the original "little one for a scent."

PROFANITY may not be a characteristic of the royal family, but some breezy day you ought to go out into the kit hen and hear the queensware.

FAITH is sometimes personified as a drenched female clinging to a sea-washed rock; but a better personification would be a bald-headed man buying a bottle of patent hair restorer.

A MASSACHUSETTS widow dresses in mourning and wears bangs made of her departed husband's hair. She prudently had saved for that purpose all that she had pulled out before his death.

ABOUT this time the thoughtful girl makes for her darling a real nice pair of cardinal red mittens, and the young man walks the streets with the similitudes of hams dangling from the ends of his coat-sleeves.

"OUR girls may hav large feet," exclaimed a St. Louis belle, while conversing with a Chicago damsel, "but we are not obliged to turn our toes in when sitting for a photograph, in order that they may appear in the picture." Chicago hasn't filed her reply yet.

A PRETTY little fairy, who livs in Islington, and who is very fond of having Bible stories read to her, ran to her mamma the other day, and said, eagerly: "Oh, mamma, please read me that pretty story over again about little Moses and the bulls rushing after him."

"I DON'T take much stock in proverbs," said Brown to Jones. "For instance, look at the oft-quoted one: 'A friend in need is a friend indeed.' Now, most of my experience with friends in need has been that they wanted to borrow. Giv me the friend that is not in need."

CAPEL is most struck in America by the precociousness of the children. He called with the archbishop upon a Baltimore lady, who said to her four-year old boy: "My son, speak to the archbishop." The boy readily held out his hand and said: "How do, Arch?"

DOWN in New Jersey the greatest barbarities are perpetrated by those who go out hunting snipe. A common occurrence is for six sportsmen to surround a single snipe and go through such ridiculous, though highly sportsmanlike, performances that the poor bird actually dies laughing at them.

A COUNTRY clergymen who recently preached in an Austin church is an admirer of the writings of Charles Dickens, and quotes from his novels almost as often as he does from the Bible. He surprised his congregation by winding up a gorgeous peroration with: "It is thus, you see, my brethren, as the scriptures say, 'Barkis is willin', but the flesh is weak.'"

DURING a dense fog, a Mississippi steamboat took landing. A traveler, anxious to go ahead, came to the unperturbed manager of the wheel, and asked why they stopped. "Too much fog. Can't see the river." "But you can see the stars overhead." "Yes," replied the urbane pilot: "but until the biler busts we ain't going that way." The passenger went to bed.

AT a school examination a clergymen was descanting on the necessity of growing up loyal and useful citizens. In order to giv emphasis to his remarks, he pointed to a large flag hanging on one side of the school-room, and said: "Boys, what is that flag for?" An urchin who understood the condition of the room better than the speaker's rhetoric, exclaimed: "To hide the dirt, sir!"

"THAT poor fellow," said a temperance orator, pointing to a cripple, "owes his dilapidated condition to whisky." "You are wrong," replied a bystander. "That man is paralyzed, and I am certain that he never drank." "Oh, that really makes no difference in my argument," rejoined the orator, "for if he had been addicted to drink he would hav been paralyzed sooner."

THERE was quite a sensation in the Austin Blue Light Colored Tabernacle last Sunday in consequence of some rather pointed remarks by the pastor, Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter, on the subject of marital infelicity. "Hit's my 'pinion," remarked the colored expounder, thumping the pulpit violently with his umbrella, "dat de husban' or de wife what breaks dar marriage vows should be put to deff." "May I ask de reverend pasture a question?" interrupted Uncle Mose. "Sartinly, Uncle Mose." "I understands yer to say dat de husban' and wife should not be unfaifful to one anudder." "Jess so, Uncle Mose." "Den ef dey should not be unfaifful to one anudder, who else shoald dey be unfaifful to in your 'pinion?" There was a painful silence for several minutes, which was finally broken by Whangdoodle, saying, in a loud and sonorous voice: "Uncle Mose, will you hab de goodness to pass de hat."

AT an Arkansas love-feast an old man was asked why he joined the church. "Well," he said, "I al'ers did hav a hankerin' airter the gospil, but this fall it come on me powerful hard. I had bad luck at the saw-mill, six o' my shoats got drowned, my gray mare broke her leg in the woods, an' everything seemed to go wrong. I tried everything, salve an' axle grease, but nuthin' seemed to help my misfortunes. I shifted from the Democrat to the Republican party, an' then changed back again, an' nothing seemed to help me, so finally I tuck up the notion that I oughter jine the church. The only thing in the way was that I didn't hav 'ligion, so I thought mighty hard over this. One day I went down to whar thar was a camp-meetin' an' drapped down on my knees. A ole feller with a slick suit o' clothes came aroun' an' axed me what I wanted, an' I told him that I wanted 'ligion. He axed me if I was afeerd that my soul would go to torment, an' I said that torment wan't botherin' me, that things on the farm won't grow ter suit. 'Wall,' said he, 'pray awhile.' Well, I prayed awhile, all the time thinkin' 'bout the kalamities at home, till at last a rough an'-ready sort o' feller come aroun' and says, 'Ef yer wanter do anything here, shout.' Wall, I got up an' shouted an' the next day jined the church, but lemme tell yer, ef them stock ain't improved I'm a goin to try somethin else."

"What a Piece of Work is Man!"

—Hamlet.

WHAT A VALUABLE JOURNAL IS "MAN,"

THE EXPONENT OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

It is Published Weekly at one dollar per Annum.

T. B. WAKEMAN and T. C. LELAND, Editors. Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Putnam, Osborne Ward, H. B. Brown, Dr. T. S. Lambert, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and other well-known writers, contributors.

MAN is every inch a man, and dares to say and do whatever becomes a man.

MAN is a man among men, hail fellow, honest, above board, and encourages other men to the same high standard.

MAN is a live man; works to raise up more live men, promotes the interests of live men, and has no mission nor message for the dead.

MAN is a friend of the poor man—"A man's a man for a' that" and takes the side of the Man of mills agatnst the man of millions.

MAN is an honest man; carries in his pocket of principles the "Philosopher's Stone"—PAY AS YOU GO! and demands that churches, ministers, and millionaires shall pay their taxes as honest men do.

MAN is a free man, and demands equal rights in the public schools and equal privileges on the first, seventh, or any day of the week.

MAN is a temperate man, but proposes to be so on his own motion, not on compulsion—because he knows enough to be so himself, not because the church is inspired from on high to force him.

MAN is a man of the world—this world—and one world at a time. The whole planet is his interest, his constituency, and his care.

MAN is a fearless, determined man.

"Whether on the gallows high, or in the battle's van,
The fittest place for man to die is where he dies for man.

But this MAN—our MAN—though "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," was not born to die. He tried recently, and couldn't. He was slightly slain "in the battle's van," but he came to life again; and now, dear reader, he asks you for a dollar for your instruction and his support.

MAN is the special organ of organization. He teaches organization, preaches organization, and works for organization as the chief ark of safety for laborers and Liberals, and the strongest force with which to meet the old organizations for the promotion of theology, tyranny, and the dissemination of useless knowledge.

MAN includes woman; is the best friend of woman, and works for her development, her just position.

In short, among the "New Political Forces" MAN is one of the Forces, and is armed for the organization of a new party and the coming struggle with the old parties.

Every reader with the least reform and progress in him should send at once for MAN. Every reader with none at all, should send and get some in him, and start right on the road to progress.

Notes and Clippings.

SYDNEY, New South Wales, has a refuge which last year housed and breakfasted 12,000 people for the amazingly low sum of $633!

A CLERGYMAN of Allegan, Mich., says that there is so much profanity in the streets of that place they are unsafe for children and unfit for ladies. What is profanity, anyway?

IT must make a clergyman feel complimented after delivering a sermon an hour long to see a three-inch report of it in the paper next day, preceded by the words, "The substance of Rev. Mr. Textural's sermon is given below."

AN insane asylum out West is reported to hav dispensed with preaching within its walls, and so many of the inmates hav recovered their sanity that the managers believe they will hav to engage another minister or close the institution.

THE telegraph announces that Guilford Soon, a negro hanged at Kingston, N. C., on the 20th, "had made his peace with God." From the negro's point of view this action was politic, but what are the advices from the party of the second part?

A LEWISTON pauper, living at the city almshouse, recently offered up the following prayer: "O Lord! bless the boss of this house; be with him daily, and with all his'n; but especially, O Lord! we ask thee to make different arrangements in that cook-room."

"OH, to think," said a religious Englishman to his gamekeeper, "that I should hav called you a d——d infernal fool! I'm very sorry. To think that one Christian should use such language to another! Heaven forgiv me! But it's God's truth all the same."

THE Crown Prince of Germany gave $25,000 to the servants of King Alfonso's palace, and $50,000 to the Spanish military asylums. The German tax-payer, remarks Texas Siftings, has reason to be grateful for a prince who dispenses such generous presents by divine right.

GOOD tenors are in activ demand with prominent churches at salaries of from $2,500 to $3,000 per year, while baritone and bassos come even higher. In contrast with this, beggary and the social evil are alarmingly on the increase. An esthetic church of the long-hair, tight-breeches type ought to draw well.

A DOZEN negro Mormons hav arrived in Salt Lake City. This givs a new color to the Mormon question. If the negroes, the pets of the government, are to be drawn into the terrible maelstrom of Mormonism, it is time the government took hold and lifted them out. It is all right enough for white trash to go wrong, but we must protect the colored brother.—Peck's Sun.

A VERACIOUS Western contemporary announces that negotiations hav been opened between the Salvation Army and Sullivan, the slugger. Every place the Salvation Army goes they get thumped, and it is believed Sullivan could do a great deal in mauling people who refuse to be salivated by the Salvation Army. The alleged "army" is composed of a lot of cranks who go around beating drums and singing "Come to Jesus" all out of tune.

MRS. L. C. GRIFFIN, who has for years been a missionary in Hindostan, recently returned to America to recuperate. To a reporter of the St. Paul Pioneer Press she described woman's life in India. She says: "The government of the house of the Brahman is strictly in the hands of the man; of the father during the youth of the family, and of the eldest son after he marries. The son always takes his wife home to the paternal roof, and as the sons marry, additions are built to the house until it often becomes a village in itself. In this place the women are imprisoned—literally buried alive. From the day of their marriage, which is at a very early age, they never see more of the outer world than the narrow expanse of sky and cloud that looks down upon them between the walls of their prison home. No men are allowed to enter the house but the members of the family and the priest, except on very rare occasions, and then unseen by the women. Married at ten years—for spinisterhood is abominable—mothers at twelve, they are faded and old at the beginning of their fifth lustrum. They die of sheer old age at about thirty."

JUST after the Sunday-school exercises in Trinity church, Mobile, the sexton began to ring for the morning service. As the bell did not sound right he requested the boys to go out of the tower-room, and a second later down came the bell through floor after floor, cutting its way as neatly as a cannon ball might hav done, and landing in the cellar, fifty feet below. The sexton dodged aside just in time to save his head. The bell lies mouth up in the cellar, and is uninjured, but it has lost its clapper.

THE concluding sentence of Mr. Darwin's posthumous paper on "Instinct," read before the Linnæan Society in England the other day, is: "It may not be logical, but to my imagination it is far more satisfactory, to look at the young cuckoo ejecting its foster brothers, ants making slaves, the larvæ of the Ichneumonidæ feeding within the live bodies of their prey, cats playing with mice, otters and cormorants with living fish, not as instincts specially given by the creator, but as very small parts of one general law leading to the advancement of all organic bodies—multiply, vary, let the strongest liv and the weakest die."

"I WANT to sleep and wake up in heaven," said John Campbell, of this city, when asked by his wife why he had swallowed a fatal dose of arsenic on Tuesday evening of last week. He was a piano maker in good employment and with no seeming motiv to impel him to suicide. He had suffered from inflammation of the brain about a year ago, and since then had become despondent, drinking some and now and then speaking of the delights of dying. He also grew particularly activ in looking after his church duties. Mr. Buckley, editor of the Methodist Advocate, stated about two months ago that only Infidels committed suicide. Since then four Christians, in this city alone, hav gone over the river at their own motion. We should like to hav Mr. Buckley restate his opinion.

AN old story turns up again: Saphir was a remarkably ugly Jew, who was deformed in person, who lived several centuries ago in Germany, and who was a marvel of satirical wit. Nobody was ever known to hav got the better of him in repartee. Many of his retorts hav been handed down to the present time. The following was his style of talking back to people: He was traveling in a stage-coach in company with two Jesuits, who made allusions to the personal appearance of Saphir, and were disposed to make fun of him generally. He put up with it for some time, but finally asked, "Who are you two fellows, anyhow?" "We belong to the Society of Jesus." "Which society of Jesus—his first or his last?" "What do you mean?" "Well, his first society were donkeys in the manger, and his last were thieves on Mount Calvary. Now I want to know to which of these societies you belong?"

THE progressiv church fair has reached Connecticut. Not to be outdone by the Canadian church which had a ballot-box-stuffing row at its fair, the Trinity Lutheran church of New Haven allowed lager beer to be sold at its fair, and had several lotteries, and waltzing besides. Pastor Siebko approved of all these ways of raising money, and smiled when he learned that some of the church members had seceded because they didn't like such things. If this remarkable evolution of church fairs continues, remarks the Sun, we shall read in the newspapers some fine morning an item like this: "The John Calvin Presbyterian church fair was raided by the police last night while a game was in progress. The chips, cards, and other paraphernalia, and stakes to the amount of several hundred dollars, were seized. Elder Tompkins and Deacon Snedecor gave bail for the arrested players. Had it not been for this untimely interference, a large sum would hav been realized for the Bamboo mission, as the betting was running high." There are evidently possibilities in the church fair that hav not been dreamed of.

THE visit of the Crown Prince of Germany to the pope of Rome givs the New York Times the opportunity to poke a little fun at the latter in this way: "It is gratifying to learn from our esteemed Roman contemporary, the Capitan Fracassa, that the Crown Prince 'manifested great sympathy with the elevated language used by the pope upon questions of religion and morality,' although he 'offered no reply thereto.' The Capitan Fracassa, which we judge to be an organ of the secular party, seems to hav expected the Crown Prince to break out into a wild eulogy of beer, Luther, sauerkraut, and Nihilism, with other forms of modern Infidelity. But the truth is that you cannot discuss faith and morals with the pope. You call upon him as the first living authority in those branches, and it would be in very bad taste to offer a 'reply' to his remarks. As an infallible expert, he is beyond the range of discussion. True believers go to him for 'points' in faith and morals just as they do to Gould for points in stock, and it is polite to pretend that you are a true believer, or why call upon the pope at all? If you see any reason to distrust the point, you can quietly 'copper' it after you leave; and it is much to be feared that the Crown Prince has already 'gone short' of the pope's conversation."

THE Christian missionaries must be doing some fine work in Alaska. There is a mission at Wrangel, in that territory, under the charge of Mrs. J. McFarland, and about forty nativ children constitute the wards of the society in the place. The pastorate of the mission church was temporarily filled by Dr. J. M. McFarland, a nephew of the superintendent. Dr. McFarland assumed to be a second Christ, and with a small band organized a Salvation Army, which made itself a nuisance to Indians and whites alike. At last McFarland got into a controversy with his aunt, and while she was preaching, protesting against his actions, he walked into the pulpit and knocked her down with his clenched fist. The last few years of the history of the mission are said to be replete with horrible tales of open prostitution carried on both inside and outside the domain of the institution, though its existence is alleged to hav been most notorious in the settlement. One of the most noteworthy cases was that of Annie Graham, a namesake of a New York lady who paid $100 a year for her clothing and other necessary expenses. Mrs. Graham had never seen, and perhaps never expected to see, her promising ward. Annie is described as the handsomest nativ girl in the settlement. She was expelled from the place for her too open and shameless conduct. Annie then went to Harrisburg, a mining camp not far from Wrangel, where her shocking exploits were every day the talk of the rough miners gathered there. A second Annie Graham was then procured in order that the $100 might still be received. This one turned out almost as bad and was also expelled. Then the third beneficiary of the unsuspecting New York lady was introduced and given the name of Annie Graham. Nellie Hamilton, named for a wealthy Boston lady, led a similar career, and another Nellie Hamilton had to be substituted. The disgusting proceedings referred to are as yet unknown in the East. The recital of the scandals, tolerated, if not caused by these factions, would indicate that the actors were crazy, and Superintendent Hill, of Portland, has at last directed Dr. Farland to go to Chilcot and Mrs. McFarland to Tougass, so that a distance of 1,000 miles may divide them.

THE Rev. Mr. Gallagher, of Kingston, Ont., is to be brought to trial before the church for having married a man to his deceased wife's sister, which act is claimed to be a violation of church disciplin.

MGR. CAPEL said in a recent lecture that "all power of government possessed by the people comes from God." He will hav hard work to make that sentiment go down with the people of this republic.

COMSTOCK has just secured the conviction of a picture dealer's clerk in this city, charged with selling improper pictures. The pictures in question were artistic representations of the nude human form.

THE Rev. Alfred F. Vedder, of Albany, indicted for malpractice, failed to appear at the trial, which was set down for the 21st. Sickness was offered as an excuse, and the justice ordered an investigation.

ATTEMPTS to enforce the Sunday laws here on the 23d were equally futil with previous efforts in the same direction. Liquor was everywhere easily obtainable by those who were so unwise as to seek for it.

CONSIDERABLE alarm is felt by English statesmen over the effect of O'Donnell's execution. The chief ministers travel with police protection, and Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt keep near them a body of armed detectivs.

THE Pedestal Fund Art Loan Exhibition in this city, for the benefit of the Bartholdi statue of Liberty, was thrown open last Sunday. More than twice as many people were present as had attended on any previous day.

THE whole town of Hebron, Conn, is divided by a religious war. One pastor has called another a polygamist because he has been married to four wives, and the latter retaliates by calling the former a liar and a hypocrit. Hence the unpleasantness.

MR. BACHE, the clergyman who claims to hav been garroted and robbed in this city some three weeks ago, was sufficiently recovered to preach last Sunday. A prominent police official has intimated that Mr. Bache's assault and robbery are a fiction. His theory is that the minister got drunk and was whipped in a street fight.

THE ATHEIST'S REPLY.

Being an unbiased exposition of the Christian system of religion, as viewed from an Atheistical standpoint. Dedicated, by permission, to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

Ye tell me there exists a God,
Whose care is over all;
Who rolls the planet on its course,
And "marks the sparrow's fall."*

I see a fiend, whose hellish leer
Distorts creation's face;
Who laughs to scorn the outraged Right,
And hates the human race!

Ye tell me of a God of prayer,
And say he lists to me,
When I approach his shining throne
In true sincerity.

I see a monster, swol'n with pride,
Who bids a pampered few
Enslave, with Custom's iron bands,
Man's reason, stanch and true!

Ye tell me of a God who hears
The houseless orphan's cry;
By whom the widow's cause is heard,
Whose succor still is nigh.

I point ye to the starving poor,
And brand the falsehood there—
In grinning Famin's wasted cheek,
And Suicide's despair!

Ye tell me, in your baleful creed,
"The ninety-nine" shall be Forever doomed to quenchless flame,
In hopeless agony.

Dare ye uphold a fiend whose face
Should be a fleshless skull,
And seat him 'pon the throne of grace,
To Justice' self annul?

A God, who of a hundred souls
But one "ordains" on high,
Should force the tainted lips of Death
To hiss his infamy!

Ye say God sent "his only son"
To preach "the holy word;"
"Good will," Christ said, "I teach not earth,
But bring, instead, a sword.

"To set the father 'gainst his son,
The mother 'gainst her child!"†
And hag-eyed Murder, garbed like Truth,
"The Rights of Man"‡ defiled!

Ye tell me that the wife should be
The creature of her lord;
Defenseless vassal of his will,
In brutish lust, abhorred.‖

Ye tell me that the slave shall bleed
Beneath the cruel whip!§
Ye rend the tender ties of blood
In twain, with sneering lip!¶

Ye say the brute that toils for man
Shall sink again to earth,
Nor rise to right its fearful wrongs
In man's immortal birth.

By Vivisection's fiery pangs
On guiltless brutes imposed,
In star-eyed Science' outraged name,
By hearts to pity closed.

By those dire agonies that thrill
The throbbing pulse of Pain
With undreamt horrors which would cast
On devils' breasts a stain!

By this, the monster crime of crimes,
By grizzly Famine's cry,
By Accident, and foul Disease,
Your fable I deny!

There is no God! Your empty creed
Is fading fast away
Before the breaking dawn of Truth,
And Reason's brighter day!

Ye prate, too, of "A Better Land,"
And bid me doubt dismiss!
Shall I, then, trust his futil power,
Who makes a hell of this?

Ye prate of Faith, and bid me turn
To antiquated lore,
In rude, barbaric times evolved
From pregnant Error's core!

Too late! Ye cannot blind the eyes
Once opened to the light,
Nor sink the risen sun of Truth
Again in rayless night!

There is no God! Unfettered Man,
Proclaim it, bold and free!
Throne, in the Tyrant's vacant shrine,
The Goddess, Liberty!

There is no God! Let Man break free
From Superstition's shroud,
Nor throne a phantom of the air
Upon each fleecy cloud!

"The gods are gone, but Man remains,"
As one †† hath bravely said,
Who, standing foremost in the fight,
For Truth hath nobly bled!

Let Justice take the place of Creed,
To man and brute the same;
Nor fetters forge for hand and brain
In dread Religion's name!§§

VIVISECTION.

[For definition of vivisection, see seventh note to "The Atheist's Reply," the poem printed just above this article.]

Few persons who hav not made this branch of physiology a special study possess even an approximate idea either of its prevalence or its horrors.

I treat of it simply as a matter of duty (or, rather let me say, of justice), and shall dwell as briefly upon it as is compatible with that sentiment. I unhesitatingly pronounce it to be the most monstrous crime, the most atrocious cruelty, in existence to-day upon the face of the globe.

I do not speak thus from a sickly sentimentality, but from convictions arrived at only after a lengthened and careful study of the matter, a hearing of the evidence from both sides, and a correspondence with the great European anti-vivisectional leaders and founders of societies, whose sole aim is to trample out this terrible crime.

So excruciating are the tortures inflicted by vivisection, and so numerous and indefatigable are those who practice it, that I can safely assert that it produces, within the compass of any given twenty-four hours, a sum of agony surpassing in its hideous total all the suffering upon the earth, or in the sea, existing during the same period, and ascribable to all other causes combined.

This statement, broad as it is, will not exceed the limits of the horrible fact. Thousands of wretches, with a smattering of scientific knowledge, and eminent physiologists as well, are at this moment, with a gusto or malignity utterly inconceivable, applying old and devising new methods of torture for the lower (?) animals.

I hav elsewhere remarked that civilized man is still at heart a ferocious savage; he is more—he is a fiend, when once that part of his nature is aroused.

Foremost among the vivisector's victims is the faithful dog, man's humble but unswerving friend, ever ready to lay down life itself in his defense.

Science (?) has exhausted her resources in devising finer and more exquisit torments for her defenseless victims.

The most terrible poisons (including the frightful curare, arrow poison of the Indians of the Orinoco, in well-nigh universal use by the vivisectors), and the electric current, are employed by these remorseless demons to extort newer and more sublimated agonies from the racked and quivering frame!

With tireless energy, with hellish delight, every note in the gamut of pain has been sought and sounded.

Dogs, rabbits, and other animals, hav been, and are still being, baked, boiled, and frozen, alive and in the fullest possession of all their faculties.

Part by part the body of the hapless victim is dissected away, every cut of the cunning knife causing intolerable pain. The eye rubbed with lunar caustic, or slowly dissected away; the hoof pared to the sensitiv "quick;" and the sciatic, pneumo-gastric, and other great nervous trunks, laid bare and irritated for hours by titillation, or application of the electric current.

Imagin the stomachs of living dogs, in their normal condition, filled with boiling water; and, to crown all, imagin the torturing of "the fifth pair," acknowledged by these scientists (?) themselvs, and by physiologists in general, to be by far the most acutely sensitiv nervous trunk in the entire body.

So extreme is the sensibility of "the fifth pair" (otherwise known as "the great sensory nerve of the head and face"), that in any animal (rendered through the administration of ether, or chloroform, utterly oblivious of all other forms of pain) the slightest pressure upon "the fifth pair" never fails to produce unmistakable signs of agony. Now this "fifth pair," be it particularly observed, is that frequently selected for experimentation, or demonstration, with the animal in its normal condition, and not in any way under the influence of an anæsthetic. Curare, remember, which (for the vivisector's convenience) is frequently employed to paralyze the motor nerves (or nerves of motion), has no effect upon the sensory nerves (or nerves of sensation), except, perhaps, to render them more acutely sensitiv.

For full directions to students regarding the modus operandi to be pursued in their operation upon an unetherized rabbit, see text book of physiology for the use of students, by Prof. Austin Flynt, of New York city. In his printed directions to the student about to experiment upon "the fifth pair," Professor Flynt uses these portentous words: "Holding our rabbit firmly," etc. The italics of "our" are my own.

What a volume is expressed in this word "our!" Not a, or the rabbit, remember, but our rabbit! And why ours? Upon the frightful principle that "might makes right;" that because we hav paid a few pennies for this bit of sensitiv flesh and blood, we hav the most indubitable claim to torture it till the torturer can no longer find a responsiv throb of agony in the inanimate mass!

This is what is going on in the good city of New York during the week, and on Sunday hundreds of sleek, well-fed parsons get up in as many aristocratic pulpits, and, with countenances beaming benignity, mildly assure us that a tender, loving God is watching over all his creatures day and night, and that he even "marks the sparrow's fall."

Away with such ridiculous twaddle! Were there, in truth, such a benignant deity, would he not be well-nigh infinitly better employed in staying the hand of the vivisector than in the super-silly occupations of "marking the fall of sparrows" and "counting hairs?"

The learned professor particularly descants upon the impropriety of employing any form of anæsthetic in this delicate operation, since the evidences of agony could not then be so accurately observed!

Some approximate idea of the prevalence of the practice of vivisection may be had when we reflect that entire factories hav been devoted to the production of vivisecting implements, and special laboratories hav been and are being added to many prominent colleges for the furtherance of the study of this department of physiology!

In addition to all this, a league of scientific (?) men has been organized for the especial purpose of promoting the practice of vivisection, and of combating, step by step, and inch by inch, the advance of the friends of humanity!

This is a painful subject, and I incorporate it with this series of essays only from a severe sense of my duty as an upright man, imbued to the heart's core with a hatred of oppression in all its forms.

I will not, however, longer dwell upon its sickening horrors, but refer those who desire to peruse a masterly presentation of the entire subject to "The Torture Chamber of Science," by Baron von Weber, one of the noblest men and most fearless reformers of this age.

Also to "Bernard's Martyrs" (illustrated), edited by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, a lady who has doubtless done more than any other woman of her time to arouse public sentiment against this monstrous wrong.

Both these pamphlets can be obtained of "The Victoria Street Society for the Protection of Animals Liable to Vivisection," 1 Victoria street, London, S.W., England, at eight cents each.

I also refer the investigator to the lecture upon vivisection delivered before the New York legislature by Mr. Henry Bergh, and obtainable, I presume, from him.

In conclusion, I solemnly exhort all my readers to join with me in doing all that lies in their power to crush this terrible crime.

Do not be misled by the specious tales of interested parties regarding the enormous benefits which hav accrued to humanity from vivisection in the past.

Such assertions are incorrect, vivisection having but served to involve scientific (?) men in squabbles among themselvs, the results arrived at by one vivisector being almost certain of disproof by another, who repeats the same series of experiments; nor is it to be wondered at when we reflect upon the abnormal condition of the natural functions brought about by the torture to which the animal is subjected.

In addition to this, it has been abundantly proven that the conclusions reached by an experiment upon a lower (?) animal cannot be considered as a safe guide for judging of its effects upon a human being. Various animals, for instance, can with impunity swallow an amount of poison which would inevitably kill several men—a familiar example being that of the pigeon's ability to consume unharmed many human death doses of opium.

I cannot lay down my pen without paying a fervent word of tribute to that noble lady, our own countrywoman, Mrs. Caroline Earle White, of Philadelphia, who can claim the eminent distinction of being (in connection with a faithful co-worker, whose name I do not feel at liberty to print) the founder of the first society in America organized for the sole purpose of opposing this terrible crime against humanity and justice, the name being "The American Society for Protecting Animals liable to Vivisection," or words to that effect.

 Vivisection is the dissecting of animals alive, and generally entirely without the use of anæsthetics, especially in the more acutely painful operations where the evidences of agony serve as guides to the operator; a practice now widely prevalent both in America and abroad, the outcome of a false science coupled with the innate thirst for cruelty in man, barren of all useful results, and the most monstrous abuse of the power possessed by the strong to oppress the weak recorded in the annals of time. §§ Personally I am neither a believer, nor a disbeliever, in the existence of a God, but a disciple of Agnosticism in all things save in the one fact of my existence, which solitary tenet has never (in my opinion) been logically questioned, not to say disproved.

In "The Atheist's Reply" I hav assumed, for the nonce, the standpoint of the Atheist, as is the privilege of the poet as well as of the logician, imagining a God in the earlier, to deny his actual existence in the latter portion of the poem.

"Long may she liv to carry on the good work" must be the earnest wish of all friends of right, as opposed to might.

I will now conclude to-day's paper with a poem, in which I deal, none too harshly, with the disgrace of modern science,

THE VIVISECTOR.

Who draweth nigh to the couch of pain
Where my darling child doth lie,
With agony writ on her wan, pinched cheek,
And glassing her fading eye?

Avaunt! Art thou come with hands that reek
With blood of the tortured brute;
With mercy seared in thy hellish heart,
And the voice of conscience mute?

But now thou stood'st by the torture trough
Where the faithful dog lay bound,
And stabbed the life of the thrilling nerve
With foul and ghastly wound!

And art thou come to my dying child,
With visage coarse and fell?
As soon would I summon the pitiless fiend
From the gulf of his rival hell!

Well is it for thee thy deeds are hid
From the eye and ear of men,
By the gloomy walls that gird thee round
In horror's noisome den!

Well is it for thee that the noble horse,
Deep-scarred by the blist'ring flame,
Hoofless and eyeless, meets not their sight
Who would execrate thy name!

Stand back, I say! If thy guilty hand
Should touch my sinless child,
Her soul might shrink from the realms of bliss,
By that blood-stained touch defiled!

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Universology, and a Criticism of the Criticisms of Mr. Putnam.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

Yes, Mr. Putnam, you must be "born again," and you must hav a "sixth sense" developed, before you can begin, even, to understand Universology; and that new birth and sixth sense will bring you to possess, really, what you now think you possess, and pique yourself upon possessing—which is the true scientific spirit (the new birth needed), and the true scientific insight (the sixth sense in question). To be able to write about science, to champion science, to proclaim its paramount claims, to state its general point of view, is not to be scientific, either in spirit or in true scientific insight. All this is a broad, loose, pseudo-philosophizing vein of literature, ventilating itself about science, but is neither science, nor in the strict sense is it philosophy even. It is what Hegel calls raisonnemens (reasonments), and not true reasoning. Universologists distinguish three stages of knowing: 1. Knowing about; 2. Knowing, properly so called; and 3. Knowing how. Mr. Putnam and I know about chemistry, and wielding ready pens, and having quite general apprehension, either of us could write columns, by the yard, about chemistry, which to the general reader would giv the impression that we were wonderful chemists; and yet neither he nor I know chemistry. We are not chemists; we hav neither the spirit, nor the insight, nor the trained intelligence of the chemist. And we hav still less the ulterior chemical knowledge of how to apply the theoretical chemical knowledge in the arts—that is to say, practical knowledge.

Now, if Mr. Putnam were to undertake to become a chemist, the first thing for him to do would be to get himself born again into the true spirit of analysis, manipulation, love of that kind of pursuit, etc. The next thing would be to develop a sixth sense—that peculiar expertness, the tactus eruditus (the trained touch), which the naturalist acquires in the handling of his substances.

What is true of Mr. Putnam and myself alike in respect to chemistry, is true of him, so far as I know and believe, in respect to science universally. He, has never been born again into the patient, precisionizing, exactifying spirit of any given science, or of science at large; and has never had the sixth sense which comes of prolonged scientific drill, developed in him. And he don't know that he hasn't it, and needs to be told it. He mistakes knowing about science for being scientific. The mistake is not peculiar to him, but reigns very generally, and stands peculiarly in my way.

Universologists, on the other hand, hav undergone this new birth into the spirit of profundity and exactitude in a degree surpassing all the special scientists even, and as applicable to the whole field of possible scientific investigation. For Mr. Putnam to attempt to tell us, or to tell the world in our presence, what Universology is, is a fact of the same rank as if a Western farmer who had pored over some chemical magazines at his leisure were to talk about chemistry in the presence of Faraday or Crookes. I do not say this to be offensiv; nor as a personality; but because it is the simple truth, and a truth which needs to be stated.

The lack of precision which I complain of crops out in a thousand ways. Take for example his two uses of the term science. He did hit upon a very good definition—that of "Systematized Knowledge," which I and others gladly accepted as a basis of unity. He must then needs rush off into another question which is, What is Knowledge? "It is," he says, "a logical necessity that we should in this connection settle the origin of knowledge," and having settled it to his own satisfaction he annexes, by a mere begging of the question, this new conclusion of his own mind, which is the matter in dispute, to his primitiv definition of science which he and others had agreed upon, and he then goes on shilly-shallying between the two opposit and mutually repugnant meanings of the term science until all certainty and definitness are taken out of the discussion. Grant that it is logically neeessary for some purposes to settle a question which was left out of account in the first definition, it does not follow that before that settlement is made, and while the question is under discussion, and whilc Mr. Putnam's opinion is denied by his opponent, that he should foist in his own opinion as a part of his first definition; or that he should use the same term sometimes to mean one, and sometimes to mean the other thing; sometimes to mean what he and others agree upon, and sometimes to mean what he and they agree upon, plus what he affirms and they deny.

A better illustration of the lack of profound scientific precision, not with Mr. Putnam only, but with others, will be best shown by a careful criticism of what he says about unity.

"The whole spirit of science is toward unity; it seeks to resolve every force into one force. This is the goal of all analysis. Science goes from the complex to the simple; the more simplicity it finds, the more satisfaction it finds. It never will explain the universe by two things, but eventually by one. The correlation of forces is perhaps the most far-reaching and astonishing discovery of the human mind. In it lies an untold wealth of achievement. Science is repugnant to dualism. The many changing phenomena must at the last hav one fountain. Philosophy and religion recognize this. Every philosophy that has ever existed has been an attempt to explain the universe by some one principle. This is what makes a philosophy, as Mr. Harris says. It is a search for unity.

"What philosophy and religion desire instinctivly, the intellect demands. The progress of science has been toward this unity. To detect resemblance is the sublimest triumph of analysis, and it is the finding of an underlying likeness in the midst of mighty contrasts that has enabled the human mind to conquer nature, and harness its flying forces. When Franklin discovered that the remote flashes in the sky were like the little electric sparkles about his fingers, an infinit wealth of power was made known. When the spectroscope reveals that the constituents of the stars are like those of our own earth, vast possibilities of knowledge flash before the mind. When man is ignorant, he sees the differences of things, and all is disorder; but when he grows wise, he sees the sameness of things, and hence exults in the harmony of law.

"Mr. Andrews cannot call the human mind from this supreme battle-ground."

Now, whether it is Mr. Putnam, or Mr. Harris, or whosoever, there has never been given, outside of Universology, any adequately close and sharp thought to the meaning of unity. It has not been perceived that unity, or oneness, has been used by all our thinkers in two exactly opposit senses—so that what they all say about the subject is nonsense until that discrimination is made and understood. The unity of one thing makes a unit; the unity of two things makes an inter-unity between them. The unity of a person makes (or is) a man or a woman; a certain unity between the man and woman makes a marriage, a married couple or pair. Unity is used by Mr. Putnam, and by all the others, with no perception of this difference, and in a hotch-potch and helter-skelter way which takes all value out of their statements. It is not true that either science or philosophy, rightly understood, seeks for the mere thingal unity of the universe, or of anything else. They do seek for a unity of relations, which unity is equality or equation, and always, therefore, implies duality as its basis. There can be no relation until there are two things to be related. The very first condition, therefore, of all science, and all philosophy, is duality, which is right in the teeth of Mr. Putnam's statement. Mr. Spencer says—and says rightly—that the basis-idea of all science is imbedded in the one word, equality; but there can be no equality until there are opposit things or aspects of things to be compared and equated. The idea of expelling dualism from science is just as radically absurd and hopeless as that of expelling gravitation from nature. What gravitation (unismal) is to nature, duality, comparison, equation (duismal), is to science.

Mr. Putnam says: "Mr. Andrews seems to think that in and through classification there is an increase of knowledge, or that something is added to the quality of our knowledge." On the contrary, I hav agreed entirely with Mr. Putnam that qualitativ knowledge is obtained and increased through the senses only; but I hav said that this is not scientific, but is natural or common knowledge, and that quantitativ knowledge (mathematical), the knowledge of relations between the things known qualitativly, is, and alone is, scientific knowledge. Mr. Putnam adds: "This I deny. The amount of knowledge is no greater after classification than before." Again: "It is a splendid thing, therefore, to acquire a certainty of our knowledge; this is science, this is classification." That is to say, classification is science, and as I affirm, the whole of science—the knowledge, of things being common and natural knowledge and not science. Mr. Putnam is here brought by his own tangled network of slap-dash statements to these curious and contradictory conclusions: First, that knowledge of relations is not knowledge, i.e., that knowledge is not knowledge; second, that knowledge of relations (classification) is science; and, third, that therefore science is not knowledge at all—which ultimate conclusion the reader is invited to compare with Mr. Putnam's starting-point of statement, which was that science is "Classified Knowledge."

I thus compare Mr. Putnam with himself. Let us now compare him with the higher authorities in his own school of thought. Mr. John Fiske has said that "All knowledge is classification." Mr. T. B. Wakeman has quoted this saying of John Fiske with approval, having placed it as his motto on the title-page of his Positiv Classification of the Sciences. This statement is the point-blank rebuttal of Mr. Putnam's peculiar statement, that classification or the knowledge of relations is not knowledge. It goes, therefore, in my direction; but it blunders, also, by going too far, and is as erroneous and confused as anything of Mr. Putnam's. It is not true that "all knowledge is classification." On the contrary, it is only scientific knowledge that is that. Natural, common, or sensuous knowledge is utterly destitute of classification. It is merely the subject matter, or stuff, to be classified, to be brought under, and to fill out the framework of science. It is indeed the natural basic knowledge upon which, if it come at all, scientific knowledge is to be afterward superinduced. This fact is the fundamentally important truth which Mr. Putnam sees, and which he is struggling to say, and which he could say without contradicting himself if he would take the trouble to hav a little preliminary training in Universology.

But Mr. Putnam does make progress. He says now: "Mathematics is the science of relations, and not of things, and its study may increase our knowledge of relations, but it cannot increase our knowledge of things. We may by a study of pure relation amplify our knowledge of relations, and in this respect I would modify my former statement, that mathematics is poetry. It is science so far as relation is concerned, but it is poetry so far as things are concerned." And yet, according to him, only knowledge of things, knowledge obtained through the senses, is science. This is so much progress in the line in which I hav been endeavoring to lead him. Another stage will bring him to the point of saying that mathematics, quantitativ knowledge, the science of relations, is absolutely all that there is of a distinctivly scientific character in all that we call science. There is no such thing as a science of things, except in so far as we mean by the phrase the science of the relations between things, or the properties of things; but there is a knowledge of things, not science, which is, historically, prior to science, and which is so allied with the natural sciences that the mistake is readily made of confounding it with and calling it science, and even of revolutionizing the truth of the subject and regarding it as the supreme science, while yet, under rigorous analysis, it is not science at all—that is to say, not "classified knowledge."

Prohibition.

The prohibitionists not long since introduced certain quotations from the writings of Dr. Wm. B. Carpenter, and Dr. Day, in favor of their views, both as regards prohibition and total abstinence. Perhaps these two writers are as able authority as may be produced on that side.

I do not mean to monopolize too much space on these questions, but, with your permission, will introduce some quotations from the pen of Dr. Hooper—author of the "Vade Mecum," and "Medical Dictionary"—which may be considered as an offset to the statements of Drs. Carpenter and Day. Dr. Hooper—in his "Medical Dictionary," under the head of "Wine"—says:

"In many diseases, wine is universally admitted to be of important service; and especially in fevers of the typhoid kind, or of a putrid tendency; in which it is found to raise the pulse, support the strength, promote a diaphoresis, and arrest putrefaction."

According to this medical practitioner, wine is certainly an important remedial agent, and those who favor prohibition, and bind themselvs by the "Total Abstinence" pledge, debar themselves from the employment of this agent, supposing they become victims to fever of a typhoid or putrid type. Dr. Hooper again says under the same head:

"Red port, and most of the red wines, hav an astringent quality by which they strengthen the stomach and prove useful."

Here is certainly more evidence which prohibitionists and "total abstainers" would do well to consider before advocating and urging their theories. On another page of his "Medical Dictionary," the same medical writer (under the head of "Brandy") remarks:

"The utility of brandy is very considerable. It givs energy to the several functions, and is a powerful tonic and antispasmodic."

In this connection, it may be well to mention that a more thorough knowledge of the action of what are characterized as "intoxicating drinks" on the human system, both in a state of health and disease, might hav a tendency to render those who are urged to commit themselvs to the principles of prohibition and "total abstinence," to exercise more caution and deliberation in the premises. It is the testimony of medical writers of undoubted skill, observation, and acumen, that there are not a few cases, wherein individuals of a feeble, enervated system, rendered thus by a low state of the circulation, which is, in very many instances, the result of poverty of the circulating fluid, hav been materially benefited by the use of wine, brandy, etc. Oftentimes has this proved true, and is, I think, a forcible and convincing reason why all who are requested to commit themselvs to the theories of prohibition, and also of "Total Abstinence," should use due care and deliberation, lest, in so doing, they cut themselvs off from the employment of articles of undoubted utility, both in sickness and health.

From what has been written, it will be seen that the medical testimony is by no means confined to one side of the question under discussion.

Very truly yours. EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

The Liberal Club.

The meetings of the Manhattan Liberal Club increase in interest, and its membership is apparently growing, as the size of its audiences certainly is. The 319th meeting, held on Friday evening, the 21st, was addressed by Madam Henri Delescluze, her subject being "Reading and Speaking as a Fine Art." Before introducing the speaker, the chairman, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, announced that the club proposed to hav a Freethought meeting at its hall on Sunday evenings once in two weeks. These meetings were to be inaugurated in order that the means of grace might not be wholly shut off from this benighted city. Madam Delescluze was then presented. This lady stated that the lecture she was about to present on "Reading and Speaking as a Fine Art" was not the one which she had purposed to deliver. She had one prepared entitled "The Mad World," but the committee on lectures objected to it, on the ground that it would necessarily involve the subject of lunacy, which would be inappropriate to the audience, and might be regarded as personal by some of the members. With this graceful compliment to the audience from which she was seeking the favor of approval, the lecturess proceeded to a discussion of her subject. Several pictures were drawn of those who called themselvs patrons of the fine arts—some who bought pictures because it was fashionable and others through a love of art itself. Literature stood at the head of the arts. Blest be the author of good books. A book is more than a painting. You take in a picture at a glance; a book is a whole gallery of paintings. There are few good readers and fewer great readers. The latter are like great poets—born, not created. Matthew Arnold, the apostle of Sweetness and Light, was a poor reader and could not make himself heard in a small hall; yet he came to this country to make money out of the uncultivated Americans by reading lectures. Hughes, the author of "Tom Brown's Schooldays," was equally vile. Many other public speakers of England were poor readers. The best readers the lecturess had ever heard were Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and Henry Ward Beecher. Madam Delescluze argued that noise was not oratory; that a cultivated simplicity was the secret of effectual elocution, and that it was the lightning, and not the thunder, that kills. In spite of her impeachment of the general sanity of the club, the audience applauded the speaker diligently, and expressed their approbation whenever an occasion for cheering could be thought to hav occurred.

Mr. Wakeman, following, expressed his regret that the madam should hav deemed it necessary at the outset to cast a slur upon the club. It was wholly uncalled for and unjustifiable. Yet who, he inquired, would hav the temerity to follow the charming speaker and endeavor to paint the lily and adorn the rose by adding to what she had said? There was one on whom the club could depend for that service. Some time ago, Mr. Wakeman said, a young man had inquired of him where he should go to hear the profoundest philosophy united with the highest and purest eloquence. He referred the inquirer to the Liberal Club. Here he would find a speaker foremost in all the arts of eloquence; a man of portly and commanding presence and infinit purity of language; a master of elocution who had won distinction at the bar and upon the rostrum; a teacher of philosophy, a monarch in the realms of oratory, and one at the touch of whose hand would vibrate every chord of feeling in the human soul. The young man attended several meetings of the club, and acknowledged that he had heard the orator who filled, and more than filled, the description which Mr. Wakeman had given. That man was Stephen Pearl Andrews; and in years to come, when we should no longer be permitted the pleasure of his presence, the younger members will refer with pride to the halcyon days of the Liberal Club, when it was their privilege to listen to the matchless eloquence of his marvelous speech. The chairman therefore called upon Mr. Andrews to address the meeting. Mr. Wakeman's tribute to the Great Universal Preacher was received with hearty and continuous applause. The recipient of the ovation, upon taking the platform, showed by a slight tremulousness of his voice that he was not altogether impervious to the emotion generated by the chairman. But without alluding to that matter, he recurred to the lecture of the evening. There was little to be added to it. One peculiarity of it was that the lecturess herself was under the fire of her own battery. A point he would like to take up was the gauging of the voice according to the size of the hall or audience. When a man went hunting it was necessary to know how heavy to load; so in regard to speaking, it was necessary to know how loud a tone of voice to use. This the speaker illustrated. Mr. Andrews possesses a voice of wonderful sonorousness, and his articulation is so perfect that his lowest tones are audible at a considerable distance. A remarkable theory was advanced by him in regard to the systematic blundering of the English cockney in the use of the letter h. It was, in effect, that the cockney employed a sort of semi-h on all words having that letter as an initial, and on all words commencing with a vowel sound. In the former class it is so faint as to be unrecognizable by our ears, in the latter so plain as to be taken by us for an h. Thus the fault lay with our ears as much as with the cockney, it being a fundamental requisit that a word should be not only correctly spoken but correctly heard.

Mrs. Cynthia Leonard knew many eloquent speakers who had never studied elocution. It was not taught in her school-days. They taught rhetoric then, but not elocution. Clear expression was as necessary as clear articulation. She had heard lectures before that club, every word of which was heard distinctly, but not more than five in the audience could say they understood it.

Mrs. Burnz spoke of the importance of a phonetic education for children. The spelling of the English language was barbarous, and pupils wasted half the four to ten years spent in school learning that which was of no use to them whatever. Mrs. Burnz is the well known teacher of a "Scool of Fonography," and has charge of that branch of learning at the Cooper Institute. She was also the inaugurator of THE TRUTH SEEKER's reformed spelling.

Mr. Chamberlain created considerable fun by taking the platform with the declaration that he was going to talk to occupy the time (an auditor uttered a prolonged "Oh!"). He said further that when he went to school he was a prodigious prodigy as a reader. A speaker should talk as though addressing the man in the back part of the hall. Some one volunteered the remark that the man in the back part of the hall had gone home, and Mr. Chamberlain's illustration of the correct method of reading to that individual was deferred. He invited the man who had said "Oh!" to come upon the platform and see what he could do.

Mr. Henry Stone arose, but denied that he was the guilty party. He said many a good speaker had been disconcerted and his speech spoiled by interruption. Mr. Stone's speech was to some extent devoted to a defense of the system by which reading was taught in the public school.

Mr. Wakeman held that a speaker should endeavor to hav some point to make when he addressed an audience. When that point was made the speaker should sit down. Alluding pleasantly to Mr. Chamberlain, he thought the audience must hav offended that gentleman at some previous time, and that he had been boring them by way of revenge. If so, the retribution had been swift and terrible.

In closing, Madame Delescluze came near spoiling the good impression which, despite her attempt at smartness, the audience had allowed her to make upon them, by remarking that she supposed she should hav said at the outset that the church was responsible for all the bad readers. The club laid everything that was bad at the door of the church. At this exhibition of unfairness Mr. Wakeman sighed deeply. It was a stroke of policy for the madam to preserve this imputation for her closing shot; otherwise her critics might not hav been so indulgent as they were. She, however, denied all intention of casting a slur upon the members of the club.

Mr. Shook failed to show up, and notice is hereby given him that if he does not soon appear, further notice of him in these reports will be omitted.

At the next meeting Mr. Louis F. Post will deliver a lecture on "Political Forces Afloat." Sometime during the month of January, Mr. M. M. Pomeroy, better known as "Brick" Pomeroy, will speak before the club. He was in attendance at the Friday night meeting.

Trifling With the United States Constitution.

It is astonishing with what alacrity some people become possessed with the idea that something must be done with the Constitution. From a dozen fields of thought and speculation comes the clamor for Constitutional recognition.

During the past week there assembled in this city a society styling themselvs the National Reform Association. The chief object of this society is to put God in the Constitution. For two evenings and one day this body of men and women deliberated on the problem, so vital in interest to all American citizens, of uniting church and state. Methinks I hear somebody ask if they had any new ideas to offer. My answer is, No. They had nothing new to offer. They reiterated their old ideas in new language, reaffirmed their old principles. I noticed that many of them tacked D.D. to their names. I think the leaders of the Salvation Army could get that degree if they could find the institution that gave it to some of these reverend specimens of humanity. During the whole of the convention there were not more than two hundred persons in attendance at any time, including the visiting members. I will here state their line of argument. They argued that the state needed the religious amendment to moralize it. On the back of the program was more argument than was advanced by any speaker during the whole convention. They had nothing to say in its favor, more than that the state needed the amendment to give it a moral character, that it would purify our politics, and that all our public officers would be moral, honest, and religious men, and not mere political schemers, trying to see how much they could make out of some petty government office.

They did not consider a single principle of government, or any one on which this government was founded. Had they come down to constitutional law, what was requisit to enact an amendment, they would have been compelled to acknowledge their fallacies. The form they decided to labor for is this: "PREAMBLE.—We, the people of the United States of America, acknowledge that Almighty God is the source of all national power and authority, and that the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler of all nations."

As long as this interest voices itself only in a very partial expression of public opinion, any amendatory action would be both unwise and impolitic.

The reason of this must be manifest, since a republican form of government can only exist, while conflicting interests rest on their arms and respect a flag of truce. When an interest once attains such a vast preponderance, when it has expressed itself in the vast majority, and public sentiment has silenced opposition, then, when it represents the wide-reaching popular voice, it is time to agitate the question of incorporating it into the fundamental law.

Now, in view of these facts, let us consider the proposition of this convention. That religion, in its pure and simple state, is conduciv to human happiness, is conceded by a large number of clear and philosophic thinkers. But it is also contended by many of these that the religion of to-day is so largely diluted with personal speculations as to hav lost much of its strengthening influence; that its expounders hav assumed the character of authorities on all subjects relating to theology, and will brook no opposit opinions. Now, conceding that the best element of religion (which is not the case) is represented in the amendment, and in the very form itself, would the cause of Christianity be bettered thereby? Do they propose to make Christians by an act of legislation? To do this, would it not require them to form themselvs into a colossal spy system?

Is it not a requisit to the efficiency of any law that it be sustained by a vigorous public sentiment? In every state, those laws on the statute book that are of dead spirit are practically a dead letter because of a lack of public sentiment to enforce them.

But let us consider another point. Suppose this amendment were pushed, and should finally be adopted—what next?

There is in this country a large body of energetic Christians owing allegiance to, and directed by the Roman hierarchy, and who hav more faith, probably, in the blessed Virgin than they hav in her son. Now, on a principle of equity, they demand a recognition of her in this amendment. Will the demand be heeded? If not, why not?

They are citizens under our Constitution; they contribute to the support of our government, of which they form a part; they represent the whole line of Christianity from the apostles down to us, and point with pride to a line of uninterrupted successors to the pontifical chair from St. Peter to Pope Leo XIII.

Once let this precedent be established, and they will not be slow in presenting their claims, judging them by their past history. Where would this matter end? And our Jewish fellow-citizens, who hav borne the stripes of persecution for ages, should not be forgotten—whose tardy messiah has been long expected, but who worship God. If they demand a recognition of Moses until their tardy messiah puts in an appearance, would their demand be heeded? If not, why not?

Through the history of the past, is there nothing found to giv alarm to humanity when the state takes part in religious controversies? Is there no danger to be apprehended to human progress when religious matters get into state affairs?

And to those who neither know history nor its philosophy, is there any record of this age that will give them any light on the question? Oh, yes. In the most primitiv countries, in the most illiterate countries, we find Christianity flourishing. But why are not their people the most flourishing, happy, and conspicuously prosperous? In Russia, whose vast area covers nearly one-sixth of the habitable globe, we find church incorporated with the state. Yet, rent and torn by discontent and commotion, her recent ruler destroyed by violence, and her present one hiding within walls of triple thickness, surrounded with guards of faithful soldiers, and her people in a state of pauperism, is her religious institution any panacea for her woe?

Every government now in the great cemetery of past nations has on its monument some religious recognition. Kings, priests, and bishops hav ever formed the triumvirate of fraud. All the petty rulers of Europe are "by the grace of God." And what do we find there? Nothing save pauperism and superstition, save in Infidel Germany and England, where we find the most renowned universities and institutions of learning to be found in the world.

Is it to these governments that the wronged and oppressed flee? Or is it where the starry flag flaunts to the breeze of heaven no flaunting lie, but where the rights of every man are guaranteed, and the motto is, Equal rights and impartial liberty and justice. W. I. IRVINE.

Cleveland, O., Dec. 16, 1883.

Col. Ingersoll as a Savior.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Now that Col. Ingersoll has converted Gen. Lew Wallace to Christianity, won't the Christian clergy let up in their lying about him for a while and see whether his work sticks. The Moody and Joe Cook kind of evangelists always hav a good list of names of converted Infidels, but they never locate them. Wallace is a big fish, and will become a standing text. He will be "boomed" on his military title, because he was never heard of as an Infidel. Most converts of this stripe hav great reputation as Infidels after their conversion. The truth is, this whole thing is another Christian dodge, as Wallace never was an Infidel. If he was, why was he contending with Col. Ingersoll, or Ingersoll with him, on the subject? The pretense is too thin. Wallace has got himself before the public too cheap. It won't pay. Reading the comments of Mr. West on the subject inspired the following letter to him, with suggestions for Wallace. The milk of human kindness always gushes when I see a chance to help a fellow-being, even with good suggestions. W. S. WOOD.

Dec. 10, 1883.

MR. S. WEST: Hav just been reading your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 17th, commenting on the conversion to Christianity of Gen. Lew Wallace through the efforts of Col. Ingersoll. It seems to me you hav not done the colonel exact justice in the matter—at least as a savior of Gen. Wallace. Nor did you notice the ingratitude of Gen. Wallace as it deserved. I do not think that the church will, just yet, canonize the colonel as a saint, nor even the savior of a great number of sinners; but according to the account of Wallace's conversion, he surely ought to hav the proper credit of being his savior and redeemer. For where and what might not Gen. Wallace hav been to-day, to say nothing of a million years hence, had he not been awakened to a six-years reflection and consequent conversion and redemption by a conversation with Col. Ingersoll? Wallace emphatically says that he was converted to Christianity by Col. Ingersoll, that "the result" of his conversation with and study of Ingersoll's views "is the absolute conviction that Jesus of Nazareth is not only a Christ and the Christ, but that he is also my Christ, my savior, and my redeemer."

This shows plainly enough that the colonel is in reality the general's "savior and redeemer," although he claims that Jesus of Nazareth is his Christ. The claiming of another person instead of the colonel, through whom he was converted, as his savior, indicates that he is an ungrateful wretch, after confessing that his conversion was by Ingersoll. It was Bob who set him thinking. It was his thinking and searching about Bob's views that led him to conversion and redemption from Infidelity. It is to deny one's savior, or to giv a bad character to the guide that leads one out of danger.

Gen. Wallace should now clench his redemption through Ingersoll by going through some of the regulations or sacrifices established by the old saints, which are still in practice in the modern churches, and adorn Christianity. He might take his choice. Either the Abrahamic custom yet in vogue with the Jewish branch might do, or being thoroughly ducked in water, or eating a chunk of bread and realizing that he is munching a piece of raw flesh, or guzzling a glass of wine and realizing that he is drinking human blood two thousand years old. Unless he thus nails his redemption and conversion to the cross through Ingersoll, it is possible he may be caught napping some day by the "evil one" and enticed again into Infidelity and back into the cold and beggarly elements of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Don't you realize that this danger may overtake him? If you know his address, write the general with these suggestions for his safety, and you may thereby "snatch a brand from the burning," as it were. The time to strike for a good weld is when the iron is hot. Very truly yours, W. S. WOOD.

The Beginning.

The learned are splitting hairs as to what is and what is not science; and, if they do not get in a fog themselvs, are unfortunately making it misty for some not learned.

A plain and short definition of science would be, I think, Illustrating and demonstrating a fact. Two apples are more than one. A handful of sand is more than a single grain.

My German friend says, "Some mens know some dings, but more almost noddings," and, making an imaginary circle with his finger says, "You see dot ring—when you inside get, you must inside stay, and when you outside are, must outside stay, and wise versa. Dose professors mit big heads hav too much talk and not enough think. Heads hollow. I dinks a load of old iron would not fill dat hole in Sho Cook's head; a flock of goose might roost somedimes, and not much run over." I nodded assent.

Of the earth, science says it probably was detached or slipped away from some inert matter, and begun business for itself. They hav not found the beginning, neither hav they seen the end.

When the material that nature has used in making a man, a combination of mind and matter, has become of no further use to the man, it goes back from whence it came and mingles with its original elements; the material part especially. But the mind, what of that? Where has it gone? And when and where did it begin? We are looking for some wise head that can tell, and will continue to be looking. And that invisible, mysterious something called mind—it was that that moved the machinery and the men that made the pyramids and the Brooklyn bridge. But for that they were no better than blocks of wood, clods of earth, and the inanimate rock. Are there samples bottled up in the laboratories? Hav the professors analyzed and found out the constituent elements, giving color, density, weight, etc.? Hav they found or made graded qualities, and are such for sale? So much of it everywhere, and yet no one has seen, found, or can put his finger on it.

No one has presumed to know or tell anything understandable about that invisible principle that moves everything, is ever present here, and if not throughout the universe and all space, it is something more than the mind can tell. To talk of annihilation is using words that are void of meaning when applied to existing things; and the same when used in relation to mind.

It existed always, and will never cease to.

> "All are but parts of one stupendous whole,
> Whose body nature is, and God the soul."

Poet's fancy perhaps it is, but fancy and fact often blend together.

Can I prove it to be a fact?

Assuredly I can. And will, if anyone can show that it is not.

There is apparently no limit to what mind is doing. Electricity it is making work at will, doing considerable in the way of talking and writing these times, and probably lacking a little only of thinking. It may be endowed with life. Who can say it is not?—for who can tell what life is, or death either?

To Mr. Winter I can extend a friendly greeting and a warm grasp. I can wish for his sake and others in sympathy with him that in that fond desire of his he may not be disappointed. He is not alone. The best and most abused man in all history believed in annihilation—see Job, xiv, 7–10, and vi, 6–10.

To be used by your best friend, his sons, and that other fellow (kinsman) always handy if a bad job was to be done—to be used as that good old man was would make me desire and probably believe in annihilation.

And those sons might hav found better business, we think. But remember how ungallant on a former occasion they behaved to the daughters of men, and the old gentleman did not even chide them. It does not look very well for the family—see Gen. vi, 2, 4. But Mr. Winter's friends never used him in that way, and I am sure his enemies never will.

Mrs. Slenker I hav always thought had a head about as level as they average. But she thinks she found evidence in Mr. Truesdell's book, for what her "soul had so long panted for," and that was to know that she had no soul (THE TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 11th). And I had supposed she had never been in doubt there.

There are many things said in that book, and some things unsaid, but few hav been able to glean from its pages that man had not, or had, a soul.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 10th we find Mr. Laperche saying, "I hav no desire for an eternal existence;" and that he had tried all the prepared dishes, Catholic, Protestant, and so down to the death-ends-all Materialism, and is the happiest in that; and then says, "I would like (at least for a time) a nice little soul," etc.

I hav never seen or been in the presence of a medium, genuin or bogus, nor hav I seen a spirit, god, or devil.

But I will say to nature, Giv me not a little one (soul) for a little time, but a robust, vigorous one for all time—one that will go with me

> "From pole to pole, > Hang o'er the sun, and with the planets roll" from sun to sun, system to system, universe to universe, then mount the comet's tail, and as we move along hear the music of the spheres. Says my German friend, "I will ride mit you."

Who will say that nature starts out, forces into existence for a moment and limits to this little mound such minds as Plato's, Socrates's, Agassiz's, Liebig's, and countless others, and then blots them out forever when just expanding, with fields boundless, space limitless, time endless, for them to grow?

If that were so, I would write across the firmament in letters of living fire that would never pale, Nature is a failure!

> "Lo, the poor Indian! whose untutored mind
> Sees God in clouds, or hears him in the wind.
> His soul proud science never taught to stray
> Far as the Solar Walk or Milky Way;
> Yet simple nature to his hope has given,
> Behind the cloud-topt hill, an humbler heaven—
> But thinks, admitted to that equal sky,
> His faithful dog shall bear him company."

Poet's fancy again—but did it ever make a white or a red Indian a bad neighbor for thinking it a reality? J. VAN DENBURGH.

Some Good Words for the Heywoods.

Friends, I've been wishing to say a little to you all in behalf of Mr. Heywood and his wife, and to ask you to send them a word of cheer and a little financial aid in this their hour of need. After years of correspondence, and reading Mr. Heywood's works—even though biased by a strict Puritanic Quaker education—I am firmly persuaded that these two Free-lovers are purer, cleaner, and better than two-thirds, and perhaps nine-tenths, of the people who condemn and abuse them. They are honest, straightforward, and plain-spoken. They are pioneers in a good work that must and will be done. They are just as right as John Brown, Garrison, and others were right, only they go too fast for their own good. They rush ahead so rapidly they get out of sight of the main body of the people, and consequently are misjudged and cruelly martyrized, just as the first anti-slavery people were, and as the first advocates of woman's rights were. But that they are right in the groundwork of their ideas on sex and its uses and abuses, few can deny. While we may not admire Mrs. Heywood's mode of expressing herself, we must own that her ideas are generally sound. I like plain Anglo-Saxon terms more and more as I grow in years. I see that it is a false prudery that makes us go away round a subject to avoid the use of some simple, straightforward tabooed word. Mrs. Heywood's idea is to make these words so common that they will no longer shock propriety, or call up any ideas that are objectionable. I can well remember how, Infidel as I was, Mr. Bennett's letter to Jesus Christ shocked me by its irreverence (?). I had not been used to seeing the subject in that light, and old prejudices made it look objectionable, daring, and blasphemous. Now, it is precisely the same as regards Mrs. Heywood and her methods. Words are created to convey ideas. To the pure all things are pure. To punish, fine, or imprison good, honest workers for human improvement and right generation, and allow acknowledged thieves, robbers, and libertins to run at large, ill becomes a civilized, enlightened community. We must help our pioneers if we would advance the cause of Liberalism and human happiness.

A Worthy Freethinker Gone.

W. H. Royce, of Flint, Michigan, died Sept. 8th, of cancer of the stomach. He was a patient sufferer during the last year, and when the time came he was found true to his record. His honest convictions were never insulted by any sort of timidity as to his Freethought opinions. In pain, as in health, he was never known to waver for a moment. He was truly a Freethinker in all that this term implies. He was proud to hav the Christian know that he could die as well as liv by the creed of Freethought. For several years he spent much of his time in the circulation of Infidel books. He never seemed happier than when engaged in this work. He felt that here was his mission, and he failed not in his work; and there are many who will testify to the success of his mission and will point to the books, papers, and tracts which Mr. Royce supplied as the foundation of the Freethought belief which they cherish to-day. He was loved while living, and mourned when dead. He was true to his best thought of what was just and true. This is the measure of praise assigned to him by those who knew him. He left a patient and loving wife and two sons to mourn for him.

Church Sociables.

"Therefore love is the fulfilling of the law" (Romans, xiii, 10).

Your "church sociable" is thought to be a modern institution. Whether it be a modern, or a very ancient religious institution revived, is a question. The editor of the New York Times considers the "church sociable," as it exists in Brooklyn, in which the religious observances are oyster stews—one oyster to an infinit amount of stew—post-offices, lotteries, puzzles, osculation, or simultaneous kissing with hugging accompaniments when reclining in hammocks—sometimes two couples together in one hammock, sort o' promiscuous like—with mock marriages, and make-believe wedding tours, as a modern institution decidedly in advance of the practice of the early Christians. I beg leave to differ with him. The New York Times is not up in the New Testament. He should read it. If he will buy or borrow a copy and turn to 1 Cor., chap. v, he will find that the Brooklyn Christians, who are said largely to represent New England training and morals, will find it hard to get ahead of the examples cited in that epistle.

It is evident that the New York Times, if he ever "experienced religion," has never sampled the various brands of Christianity that are to be found in the city of the great scandal. Had he done so, he could not hav lost his head so entirely in consequence of reading the Higbie (or Hugbie) Vaughn trial, which grew out of a mock marriage, as the defendant claims, but a bona fide marriage as the plaintiff claims, at a Flatbush church sociable, July 19, 1883, as to call on the government to send troops—troopscommanded by Phil. Sheridan—troops commanded by Phil. Sheridan with the Rev. Dr. Talmage as joint commander-in-chief — with instructions to put to the sword, to exterminate every inhabitant of the eminently pious Flatbush region, without distinction of age or sex, who attends the Flatbush church sociables.

Mr.—or rather Dr.—Talmage is said to be ready to march, at a moment's warning, and urge on the troops to their bloody work.

Now, here is a state of things that may be called, without exaggeration, a pretty considerable of a state of things—a state of things that may end in gore; and all growing out of the supposed efficacy of hugging and hammocks as used by Hugbie—or Higbie—and others, in connection with the Flatbush church sociables, solely as a means of grace! Everything was lovely. There were Miss Higbie, and Miss Mundy, and Miss Hontman, and ever so many more; and Mr. Vaughn, and Mr. Neefey, and Mr. Areson, and the Flatbush Cupid, and a lot more. Miss Higbie said, "Let's get married, just for fun;" and said, "Come, Walter, marry me." Then they stood up, and one of the boys personated a clergyman, and asked Walter, "Will you take this woman to be your wedded wife, and get up in the night and take care of the baby?" And he replied, "I will." And then he asked Anna, "Will you take this man to be your husband, and get up early and make the fire and get his breakfast?" And she said she would. Then they were pronounced husband and wife, and everybody hugged and kissed somebody. Afterward the girls got into a wagon, and the boys drew them around the yard and called it a bridal tour. But after a while, into this state of innocence, simplicity, and bliss, walks the lawyer, like the devil into paradise.

Mr. Legget (lawyer) questioning a witness, Miss Mundy:
"When Walter called how would he act?"
"He used to hug and kiss her all the time; that's all I know."
"Did they always hug and kiss when they were together?"
"There wasn't a night, when I saw them, that they wasn't hugging and kissing each other."

It seemed, on a cross-examination, that there were two hammocks on the lawn, and when the married couple were hugging and kissing in one hammock, the witness and some young man were hugging and kissing in the other.

In the gospel firmament of Brooklyn there are three burning and shining lights, Storrs, Talmage, and Beecher. Probably the last is as well acquainted with the condition of vital religion in Brooklyn, as Paul was with the character of his communicants. Whether Beecher could make disclosures as edifying as those of Paul we don't know.

All these young men swore that they hugged and kissed all these girls with the most perfect freedom, in the presence of the girls—and weren't they mad? But why should they be? If, by kissing and hugging and lying in hammocks with young men, they can induce them to hav their names recorded in the "Lamb's Book of Life," will it not be accounted to them for righteousness? And will not the increased number of communicants, under the Brooklyn system, show that the kingdoms of this world are fast becoming the kingdoms of our Lord Jesus Christ?

There was, formerly, in our theaters, a place known as the "third row," to which women were admitted free, as an inducement for men to frequent the theater. It has been abolished. But the children of light hav grown wiser than the children of this world, and established the "church sociables," where greater familiarities are allowed than were tolerated in a theatre. It is a success. Your modern church sociables of the Flatbush pattern, with its oyster suppers, its hammocks, and its hugging, and its picnics in groves, where sweet little loves of misses sell kisses to beaus, will hasten the time when "Jesus shall reign from shore to shore."

SENEX.

Mr. Hull Scores Some Points.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You may know by the reading of the inclosed that it was not prepared for your paper. The editor of the Spiritual Offering did not positivly decline to publish it, but, to use his own words, he "hesitated."

The policy of the Offering is to keep out of war, and as there was a possibility that the inclosed might start a controversy, the editor was glad I saved him the alternativ of getting into a controversy or declining my article. I know THE TRUTH SEEKER fears nobody or nothing. What it desires above all things is to stir thought. I therefore send it to you.

Permit me to say I think no less of the Offering for preferring not to open its colums to controversial matter outside of Spiritualism proper. Every editor has an undoubted right to mark out the policy of his paper. MOSES HULL.

Three circumstances occur to my mind that lead me to ask, Was Haman the only one who ever erected a gallows on which himself was to hang?

1. Not many years since the editor of a semi-Spiritualistic journal said, "The time will come when some outraged husband or father will shoot — —— and — —— down like dogs for seducing their wives or daughters." The individuals named perhaps had never seduced or thought of seducing anybody in the world. Not long after this remark was made, this same editor was shot down like a dog for seducing his neighbor's wife.

Was this man prophetic in his remark, only making the mistake of setting the wrong individuals as the subject of his prophecy? Or was there an unseen power which caused him to drink the cup he had prepared for innocent persons, or is it only in the course of events, and would it hav come any way?

2. The recent passage of Ed. S. Wheeler to the spirit-world, under very peculiar circumstances, suggests a few queries, at least, if it does not teach a lesson.

Let me preface my narativ of the circumstances by saying Mr. Wheeler was always a personal friend of mine. Never, during the unjust war that was made on me for my radicalisms, did I hear of Mr. Wheeler saying a word against me. On the other hand, I did hear of his speaking in my favor on several occasions. As secretary of the Neshamany camp-meeting he honored me with an invitation to be one of the regular speakers. I make this statement so that all can see that prejudice has nothing to do with what I write. I write neither to benefit or injure anyone, but to see whether we would not do well to study the lesson.

Now to the point. As secretary of the Neshamany camp-meeting association, Mr. Wheeler engaged that indefatigable worker and true woman, the late Laura Kendrick, as a speaker at that meeting. When she got there to fill her appointment, he was surprised, or feigned surprise, to find that Laura Kendrick was none other than she who had been first Laura Cuppy, and afterward Laura Cuppy Smith. Though Mrs. Kendrick was advertised to speak on Sunday, and over ten thousand people had come out to hear her, she was driven from the platform and forbidden the privilege of speaking, Mr. Wheeler simply making the explanation that he did not know who she was when he engaged her, or she would not hav been engaged and advertised. A person, not worthy to buckle Laura Kendrick's shoes, was chosen to speak in her place. This outrage, especially when perpetrated in part by two fellow-speakers, one as secretary and the other as speaker, so humiliated Mrs. Kendrick, and gave her such a nervous shock, that she had a stroke of paralysis, and was finally driven out of the body.

It was a case of murder—unintentional murder perhaps, yet murder of one of the most honest, devoted, and intelligent women that ever stepped upon a spiritual rostrum. Mr. Wheeler may hav been as innocent as any angel in heaven—if so, he was the unconscious tool used to remove one of the world's best and noblest workers from the field.

3. Mr. Wheeler was one of the honored and invited speakers at the late Lake Pleasant camp-meeting. On a week-day afternoon he said some very hard, but very just things, about the Fitchburg railroad. Now, be it remembered, the Fitchburg railroad furnishes the camp-ground free of cost to the camp-meeting association, and pays the expenses of the camp-meeting, all of which is a grand investment for the road, as the meeting brings it probably not less than one hundred thousand extra passengers.

The officers of the Lake Pleasant camp-meeting are not fools. Even "the ox knoweth his master and the ass his master's crib." They saw that it would not do to get into a fight with the railroad while the railroad was giving them such grand and free entertainment. The result was that Brother Wheeler was "called to order" in such unmistakable terms that their meaning could not be misunderstood. He was not permitted to fill his other appointments. The humiliation and nervous excitement so affected poor Brother Wheeler that he was carried off the ground, and never spoke to the public after that. It was a case of murder. Was it retribution? "These things are an ensample unto us." MOSES HULL.

Mr. E. M. Davis's Views.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of Dec. 8th, page 777, you suggest that the Greenbackers or Anti-monopolists should attach to their platform the "Nine Demands of Liberalism." For one, I should be glad te see it done. But I write mainly to say, why not attach our nine demands to yours? There is a growing disposition to hav the different reforming elements combine at the polls, so as to show their numerical strength. Their moral power is much greater, but to those who depend upon votes such a demonstration might be of service. It was in the hopes that some combination could be made that I wrote the inclosed letter. I should like the portions marked published in your journal. I also inclose copy of my financial ideas.

E. M. DAVIS.

The letter Mr. Davis speaks of was written by him to our mutual friend Louis F. Post, and published in John Swinton's Paper. The portion Mr. Davis especially refers to is as follows:

"We can easier combine on an individual than on objects and measures; and, because an individual campaign creates enthusiasm, we can make a wide and deeper demonstration. Nominate Wendell Phillips for president, and you hav a platform in the man. Any organization that indorses the man—and Wendell Phillips is the man of the hour—indorses a platform that embraces the best part of each of our reform organizations.

"Do not let us be anxious about success or defeat at the polls, nor about the ability or want of experience as an office-holder of our candidate for president! To succeed in 1888 we must concentrate in 1884. It will be the means of bringing out our real power at the second effort. We know Phillips to be honorable—and this is more than to be honest, according to the World's definition—to be sagacious, disinterested, sympathetic, just, generous, and, as an orator and expounder of true principles, unsurpassed."

Mr. Davis's financial ideas are set forth in the following platform:

There can be no other money than fiat money;
That it is legislation, and that alone, that can convert anything into money;
That use is the standard of value;
That the legal power given to gold givs it a fictitious value;
That its value should be tested by the same standard that copper, iron, or anything else is;
That money should be made of the least valuable material, other things being equal;
That all metallic money should be demonetized;
That to measure gold by gold is measuring a thing by itself, and palpably absurd;
That legal tender paper money is proved to be the safest, most convenient, and most economical of any yet devised;
That it should be supplied by the national government to those who can giv real security, and at an interest not exceeding two per cent per annum, returnable at the option of the borrower, thereby making inflations and panics impossible;
That wealth and money are not the same. Only labor can make the first; only law the last. One is the object to be exchanged, the other the medium by which the exchange is made;
That to the error that they are the same is owing, in a great measure, the difference in the condition of the people;
That the money monopoly and the fallacy on which it is based is a great overshadowing evil, being the creator of paupers and millionaires; and
That selling the right to supply the currency is treason to the people, as it is transferring to a few what belongs to the whole people.

Who Are the Real Blasphemers and Robbers?

Are they not those who believe and preach that a god they call Jesus tramped around like a Hindoo juggler, performing the monstrously low and absurd sleight-of-hand tricks of drinking poison, handling snakes, healing the sick, enabling the lame to walk, and the casting out of the evil spirits from a maniac, and of sending them into a gang of hogs, and then of being taken by Satan into a mountain, who offered him all the kingdoms of the world to fall down and worship him?

Now if there can be such things as blasphemers, it must be those who believe and preach such discreditable miracles, so contrary to universal experience and the operations of nature. Yet these deluded blasphemers persecute and punish those who do not blaspheme, like themselvs, as blasphemers. Yet the priesthood of the English church, extorting and robbing labor of more than all other religions besides, hav with a barbarous and criminal piety imprisoned Messrs. Foote, Ramsay, and others a year for illustrating vividly the monstrously vulgar description of their imaginary God, pictured in their Bible with a mixture of the sublime and vulgar, with stars in one hand, the lightnings in the other, with a sword from his mouth, burning coals at his feet, and smoking like a chimney from his head.

Yet with such astonishingly absurd descriptions and dogmas of the church, its priesthood, leagued with that of a secular and political one of office-holders, labor-saving machine manufacturers, bankers, and speculators, are absorbing the whole property of the earth, lands, houses, and all movables, with the legalized robbery of four-fifths of the product of labor.

It is these deluded religious and secular priesthoods, then, that are the real blasphemers and robbers of the laboring masses. But they do it unconsciously, with some exceptions, because they are trained under institutions wholly founded upon the erroneous principles of alienation, monopoly, and usurpation of all man's rights. Thus vice, wrong, and crime through man's ignorance are legalized, instead of their opposits, virtue, right, justice, and innocence.

But it is only religious evil that is beginning to be seen far more than the secular. The Positivists, disciples of Comte, are denouncing the dogmas and evil of religion, but aristocratically trying to retain the secular institutions of all nations, with slight modifications. They are striving to retain Blackstone's form of society, as a pyramid, by substituting a graduated scale of classes, with the laborers at bottom, rising up through mechanic, artist, professor, scientist, author, governor, etc., in the place of his scale of workers, lords, earls, viscounts, and dukes, with a king on the apex. Friend T. B. Wakeman advocates this modified scale of classes, and believes with Bismarck that the people hav no right of sovereignty or power of government. He illustrates with the figure of a pyramid in his book to represent his improved scale, which givs lawyers and other professors a fixed salary.

Friend Stephen Pearl Andrews also advocates this pyramidal scale of classes and calls it a pantarchy, and puts himself on its apex as a pantarch. With all his learning he cannot explain his Universology of unism, duism, and trinism. Thirty-two years ago I strove to teach him the true alphabet, that there are precisely eleven vowels or sonants in the human voice, and that the twenty-two consonants are merely the touchings of the parts of the mouth, and modify the generic vowels into species, while there are no such things as semi-vowels, etc. Neither he, Graham, Longly, Ellis, Pitman, or Prof. March hav ever discovered the distinction between sonants and consonants, which can be seen by looking in the mouth with a glass. LEWIS MASQUERIER.

Gems of Style.

There are, among the innumerable prose works published in the English language, only a few pages comparativly, altogether, that stand at the very supreme summit as being most beautiful. It is but a very few years since book-making became so very common. Bolingbroke is about the first among English prose writers whose style is modern and popular. He flourished about two centuries ago. Macaulay by combining his style with some peculiarities of his own, produced striking effects, and became the most popular essayist of the nineteenth century. The following is a sample of Bolingbroke's very peculiar style. Speaking of the slight regard in which public writers were held by great ministers of state, he says, "Let him speak as contemptuously of us as he pleases, for that is frequently the manner of those who employ us most, and pay us best; yet will it fare with his ambition as with a lofty tree which cannot shoot its branches unto the clouds, unless the root work into the dirt from which it rose, on which it stands, and by which it is nourished."

There are numberless strikingly beautiful expresions in the works of this writer. He was one of the earliest of Freethinkers, and those who like to read after such writers will find few works more profitable than his philosophical studies. Even to this day, no one has surpassed him in a certain melody of expression that charms the attention. Writers prior to his day were heavy and elaborate as a general thing, and where they attempted to please, it was too evident they were trying to ornament their decorations, to use a saying among architects.

There is a much admired passage of Milton in his prose writing, which is at the same time characteristic of his style. In his Areopagitica 'tis found: "Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation, rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks; methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unsealing her long abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their curious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms."

The sublime grandeur of Milton rolls forth in every line of this.

De Quincy, who, above all men that ever put pen to paper, had the power to place the right word in the right place, with harmony and meaning in perfect accord, admires a certain expression of Sir Thomas Brown as the finest in the English language. It is found in his "Urn Burial," chapter fifth: "Now since their dead bones hav already outlasted the living ones of Methuseleh, and, in a yard under ground, and thin walls of clay, outworn all the strong and spacious buildings above, and quietly rested under the drums and tramplings of three conquests, what prince can promis such diuturnity unto his relics." The words, "quietly rested under the drums and tramplings of three conquests," were what captivated the imagination of De Quincy. Taking sound and sense together, he considers them unequaled, and he dilates considerably upon them. His own writings are full to overflowing with richest imagery in language suggestiv of all noble music and sublime echoes. Even when upon that, to most of us, driest of subjects, political economy, he wraps some of his views in expressions of Miltonic grandeur. Thus, at one place, speaking by way of illustration, he asks, "What if but three definitions or axioms of geometry were liable to controversy? What would follow? Simply this, that the whole vast aerial synthesis of that science, at present towering upward toward infinity, would exhibit an edifice eternally, perhaps, renewing itself by parts, but eternally tottering in some parts, and in other parts moldering eternally into ruins. That science which now 'holds acquaintance with the stars' by means of its inevitable and imperishable truth, would become as treacherous as Shakspere's stars of sand; or like the fantastic architecture which the winds are everlastingly pursuing in the Arabian desert, would exhibit phantom arrays of fleeting columns and fluctuating edifices, which, under the the very breath that had created them, would be forever collapsing into dust."

The above shows De Quincy's manner perhaps as well as anything I could quote. His manner, but not the highest flights of his muse, for muse it is. The very soul of poetry breathes out from much of his writings.

But, should this subject be pursued even into its prefatory grounds, a volume would be required.

Christianity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the issue of your paper dated Nov. 24th there appeared an article written by Mr. Elliott Preston, under the above title, in which the writer makes the following statement:

"The Jewish mythology was transferred, substantially, from the Hindoo philosophy, and that, in all probability, from systems still more ancient."

During the latter part of the last century there was published in London, England, a work bearing the title of "A Comparison of the Institutions of Moses with those of the Hindoos and other Ancient Nations," in which the author, the Rev. Joseph Priestley, LL.D., endeavored to show that the Hindoo religion was copied from the Hebrew. Since his day, however, scholarly investigation and criticism hav shown that "Hebrew mythology"—commonly called "Hebrew theology"—such as we read in the Old Testament, is quite modern. Before the Babylonish captivity (588 B.C.), Israel had no sacred writings. They had certain laws, etc., but they were not considered binding or of divine authority. Their mythology, which Christians of the present day call the "word of God," concerning the creation, fall of man, deluge, tower of Babel, etc., was made by Jewish priests who had become familiar with Babylonian mythology. In other words, they borrowed these fables from their conquerors; and, after altering them slightly, added them to the history of their people. These are facts which the "cuneiform inscriptions" discovered by modern archæologists tell us, and scholars, both in and out of the Christian fold, accept them. Under these circumstances then, we are inclined to question the above statement, and should like to know upon what authority it was made. We are then told that:

"In the Hindoo fable we hav the garden of Eden (Island of Ceylon); the first man, Adam (Adami); the first woman, Heva (Eve); Cristna (Christ); Siva (Satan); and Vishnu (the Almighty)."

Ceylon was never believed by the Hindoos to hav been the paradise or home of our first parents. On the, contrary the Hindoo fable states that the summit of Mount Meru—which was in the center of the earth—was the paradise. Again, the first man was not called Adam (Adami), and the first woman Eve (Heva). And if by Cristna, or—as he elsewhere writes it Christna, he means Crishna, we are at a loss to know upon what authority he spells the name in this manner. Crishna, the hero of the Maha-bharata, was dark-skinned, and thus he derives his name. "Crishna" is a Sanscrit word, and signifies "the black one." It is not possible to convert the name into either "Cristna" or "Christna."

After this we are informed that:

"History boasts upwards of a dozen "crucified saviors," so that even in the item of a savior, where many of us supposed ourselvs strong, we are, in reality, painfully weak."

If the writer intends this statement to be taken figurativly or allegorically, we hav no comments to make, excepting it be that he should hav said so; but if he intends his words to be understood literally we must again ask him to giv his authority; and if he will mention a dozen "crucified saviors" which "history boasts of" we will not ask for more.

As unbelievers in "divine revelation" we should be able to giv our reasons for "departing from the faith;" and these reasons should be fortified with facts, not fictions. It is on this account I offer these friendly criticisms. Our opponents must be faced by statements which we can stand by and support; nothing else will answer. D. W. T.

Science Defined by one of the Unlearned.

The learned seem quite satisfied with the definition of science, "systematized knowledge," and yet they use the word science in a great variety of senses. This fact to my mind, is proof that it remains an open question yet, "What is Science?" I answer, science is the eternal, unchangeable, systematized order of nature in producing her results. They, therefore, who diligently study nature, and arrive to a perfect acquaintance with her system of operation, are scientific. Their knowledge is systematized. They have perceived the perfection of the forces and motion of natural principles in the production of harmonious results. Their knowledge does not increase, or their ignorance diminish the universal whole. Natural sciences are numerous and diversified. One may be a scientist without a knowledge of the whole. "Universology" is the whole. If I am mistaken, inform me. I'm a "truth seeker."

Murdered by Neglect.

From the Colorado Transcript.

Last June Corey Waugh and his young wife, aged 22 years, came to Colorado from Missouri. About a month ago they moved into Buffalo Park, under the employ of Antrim F. Roy, who assigned them to a small cabin near by as their home. On Tuesday, the 23d ult., Mrs. Waugh gave birth to a son. Two days afterward, owing to the insecurities of the cabin from the strong winds and storms, coupled by the indulgences of a tender husband, Mrs. Waugh became very ill, apparently with puerperal fever. A few kind neighbors, being notified, came and did what they could for her; but the malady increasing to an alarming state, it was deemed advisable on Saturday night to summon a physician. Mr. Roy, the wealthiest ranchman of the park, whose credit is unquestioned, immediately dispatched one of his hands to Morrison, the nearest town, for a doctor, instruction being given for him to come at once, that his fee was ready. Dr. Ellerson was the first visited. This distinguished individual lays claim to the dual work of administering to the needy spiritually as well as therapeutically, and on the former account declined to go, as a sermon had to be preached the next day. The messenger then saw the other doctor, Witham, who said it was too long a journey for that night; and in any event wouldn't go unless the money was given in advance. Thus, Mrs. Waugh's suffering, without proper treatment, gradually became more intense, and on Tuesday another call was made upon Dr. Ellerson, who nullified the demand because he "had no horse." The next day the third and last visit was made, with the same negativ result, however, Ellerson saying he "didn't want to go 'way up in the mountains." This same day Mrs. Waugh's suffering lulled her into unconsciousness; and on Friday afternoon, she passed away—literally murdered by neglect.

It seems strange, in reviewing the action of these doctors, that two men, presumably drilled in the hospital wards and clinics, where science teaches that to assuage misery is the highest mission of man—it seems strange that this heaven-capped learning should be easily weened away, and supplanted by motivs so sordid, and actions so base and brutish. No trivial excuse can answer for a demand at the sick-bed; the obligation to alleviate suffering is almost sacred. If there are such things as God's regents on earth, they are certainly the physicians.

These doctors had no right, morally or legally, to refuse to attend. "The sermon" could hav been forgone; a soul writhing in agony is more an object of redemption than those languishing in ease and plentitude. The "advance fee" was unwarranted; the country makes secure indebtedness of that nature, where families are unable to pay. "Having no horse," by a doctor, is quixotical in a town sustaining liveries, and in a state where riding-ponies can be had almost for the asking. The refusal to go "'way up in the mountains" was an evasion; the trips, to and fro, could hav been made in five hours.

No person of heart and brain is without an appreciation of the circumstances of these mountain people; and where professionally trained hands locate in isolated places, they cannot be blind to the responsibilities attaching thereto. RICHARD E. LABAR.

The Mormon Question.

the Bighamton Sunday Tribune.

Few Americans know anything of the true nature of the Mormon problem. The Mormons themselvs, since their settlement in Utah, hav been made familiar to us until recently only through the medium of books written by casual tourists, professional wits, and more or less purposeless newspaper reporters. Otherwise the average American of the East knows and cares as much about the Mormons as he does about the Red Indian, and no more. He thinks the Mormon question one for the government to settle in some way without bothering him, and thinks no more about it.

The Bennett Celebration.

The hall of the Liberal Club was well filled last Sunday night, the 23d, the occasion being the 65th anniversary of the birthday of D. M. Bennett. The services partook of the nature of a memorial meeting, as well as celebration, for none could forget that it is only a few days over a year since we laid our hero away.

Preliminary to the main meeting the members of the Bennett Auxiliary League met in one corner of the hall and elected officers for the ensuing year. S. P. Putnam was made president, E. M. Macdonald and Henry Stone vice-presidents. The other officers were taken from the Macdonald family, as being, next to the president, the most activ workers. Mrs. A. C. Macdonald will write the records of the meetings for the next year, and George E. Macdonald will hold the funds. The next meeting of the League will be on January 29th, to celebrate the birthday of Thomas Paine. The League invites all interested to add their names to its membership roll. Applications may be made to any of the officers.

Mr. Putnam then called the assemblage to order, making a brief speech. He was followed by T. B. Wakeman, Edward W. Chamberlain, Henry Stone, and Stephen Pearl Andrews. As we close THE TRUTH SEEKER forms one day earlier this week to enable the workmen to celebrate the pagan festival of the 25th, we must defer an extended report of what was said until next week.

On a table in front of the platform was placed an easel holding a bronzed plaster cast of the heroic sized medallion designed for the monument. Over the head was a laurel wreath, the drapery of maroon bunting setting the whole off in pleasing contrast. The face was veiled with flags, which were removed amid applause at the close of Mr. Putnam's remarks. It was the general opinion that the medallion is a triumph of the sculptor's art, and Mr. Wilson Macdonald was called upon for a speech, which invitation he declined, not having been a close enough personal friend of Mr. Bennett's to be able to interest the audience. It may be proper to explain that Mr. Macdonald, although bearing the same name, is no relation of the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER that either is aware of, and only once met Mr. Bennett in the latter's lifetime. His reputation as a sculptor is splendidly sustained in this, his last work, the likeness being remarkable to be wrought out in bronze.

It was nearly eleven o'clock when the audience dispersed.

Boston Honoring Mr. Bennett.

The sixty-fifth anniversary of Mr. Bennett's birth was also commemorated by the Liberals of Boston. Before the Thomas Paine Fraternity, John Storer Cobb began last Sunday a series of short biographical sketches of the world's martyrs to free speech, and his first lecture was on the life and work of our hero, Brother Seaver was also announced to speak upon the same topic. We shall be able to giv a synopsis of the meeting in our next issue, along with the report of the proceedings in this city.

A Cheering Sign.

Note was made last week of the efforts of several artists to procure the opening of the Art Loan Exhibition in aid of the Bartholdi statue pedestal fund, at the Academy of Design, 23d street and 4th avenue. We are pleased to state the effort has been successful, the executiv committee, on the 19th inst, voting to this effect. The new order of things began last Sunday, the 23d, the day the Liberals of the city were celebrating the 65th birthday of Mr. Bennett.

The election of Carl Schurz to the chairmanship of the meeting discussing this question indicated that the opposition was defeated in advance, for Mr. Schurz is a Materialistic Infidel of the German school. The arguments for the opening of the exhibition were adduced by Mr. Schurz and his supporters. It should be done, they argued, for the benefit of a very great number of people who cannot attend on other days. There are a large number of people who are compelled to work from early morning till late at night at this season of the year, who would be very much benefited by a visit to this exhibition. An opportunity to visit so good a one would probably not occur again for some years. The question of opening large art galleries on Sundays must be met sooner or later, and this certainly seemed an excellent place to begin.

General Hawkins, another prominent New Yorker, spoke very emphatically in favor of the new movement. In all other civilized countries the large public art galleries and similar exhibitions are thrown open on Sundays, and are thronged by men, women, and children in the lower strata of society who can not visit them on other days of the week. He thought it should be so in this country, not alone in New York, but in other large cities. Such exhibitions had an elevating influence on society, no matter on what days they are kept open; and they would tend to draw men away from beer gardens and liquors shops which are always open on Sunday.

The opposition was confined to a few ladies whose reasons were chiefly of the sentimental sort well known as the cheap stock in trade of Sabbatarians. They were of no avail, and the executiv committee voted by a large majority to throw the exhibition open. Their action is generally approved by the press of the city, the Times, usually very conservativ, saying:

"There will be a very general approval of the vote of the managers of the Bartholdi Fund Exhibition to permit the opening of the collection to public view on Sundays at a reduced admission fee. Undoubtedly, many sincere and sensible people hesitate to sanction what seems to them an invasion of the sacredness of the Christian Sabbath. If the Sabbath were kept as these excellent people would like to see it kept, there would be less occasion for concessions like that which has been made in behalf of the Loan Exhibition. But, unhappily, working people, to whom Sunday furnishes the only breathing-spell in seven days, find immoral and debasing amusements open to them on every hand. The idle workman, pining for a little change in his daily round, is not guarded by the law—scarcely by public opinion—against vicious resorts. Why should he be forbidden to look into a collection of beautiful things in art? Because rum-sellers, gamblers, and dance-house keepers violate the Sabbath, must decent people, therefore, shut up their picture galleries and reading-rooms?"

Last Sunday was the first day under the new rules, and the attendance reached thirty-five hundred, the price of admission being twenty-five cents. The bigoted spirit of the Sabbatarians was shown in the action of a so-called "Law and Order" society, composed of church members, who called at the office of the Exhibition and notified the managers that selling catalogs would be an infraction of the penal code, and would be prevented. To get around this miserable interference the directors scattered catalogs throughout the rooms, with a note written on the cover of each asking visitors not to carry them away. It is a scathing rebuke to the fanatics that the daily papers record that not a catalog was missing at the close of the day.

A petition was presented to one of the directors against the opening of the exhibition. The signers are what Mr. Swinton would call the "fools of fortune, the peanut-headed dawdlers of fashion and frivolity, the soft-sawder clergy," who, living on the fruits of their parent's successful ventures in soap-fat, tallow, and hides, hav an abundance of time to visit the exhibition on week-days, and consider that the eyes of workingmen resting upon the expensiv works of art will depreciate their value. In the following answer Mr. Smith must hav intended the "distinguished citizen" as an ironical allusion. He wrote to them:

"GENTLEMEN: I hav the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your esteemed favor of even date, protesting against the opening of the Bartholdi Art Loan Exhibition on Sunday. Your communication contains the names of many of our most distinguished citizens, and is worthy of the highest consideration. You are, however, fully aware that an equal number of our citizens, and equally distinguished citizens, indorse the action of our Executiv Committee. It therefore is a question about which honest men differ. Its precipitation at this time grew out of an earnest appeal from a large body of our artists whose efforts hav helped to make this exhibition the success that it is.

"These gentlemen realize the fact that every branch of industrial art is educational, and that the direct means of accomplishing this is to allow the citizen to see for himself. They feel that this collection is so rich in the rarest specimens of all that is best in silver work, embroidery, metal work, glass, bronze, and carving, and the opportunity to see such a collection is so seldom offered (none for five years), that they want this one to be of some practical use.

"They believe that education is next to religion in the accepted use of the term, and they earnestly desire that the masses of our people, who work from 7 A.M. to 6 P.M., and many, during these holiday times, until midnight, shall see for themselvs what constitutes the surroundings of a refined home life, and in what education results.

"They believe that there are thousands of work girls, apprentices, retail salesmen and women, and day laborers, who would gladly giv up the life they now lead on Sunday if there was anything else for them to do.

"They regret that the council of the National Academy of Design, the trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and the directors of the Lenox and Astor libraries keep their doors practically shut to these people, and so close the greatest avenue of healthy moral enjoyment within their reach. They are thoroughly convinced that a girl who stands on her feet behind a store counter twelve hours a day is in no condition to walk through a picture gallery or art museum at night, nor are scores of others who are similarly overworked.

"They know, therefore, that Sunday is the only day left to these people, and they believe they are doing the greatest good to the greatest number of our citizens by adhering to the action they hav taken.

"They believe that the quiet corner of a great library is as beneficial morally to a tired man as a seat in a church, and that the opening of every art gallery, museum, and library in our city and country on Sunday would but result in drawing many men and women out of the streets and saloons, and within their restful walls.

"And they finally hope that the example shown to-day at the Academy of Design will result in a change of policy in the institutions referred to more in accordance with the spirit and tendency of the age in which we liv. It seems to me eminently appropriate and a subject for congratulation that before the great statue of 'Liberty Enlightening the World' has even reached our doors a ray from her beneficent torch has broken the customs and by-laws of one of our oldest art-centers, and that to-day the full light is shining through the open doors of the Academy of Design. And I feel assured that many of you who hav signed this protest, and for whose opinions I hav the highest respect, will, before many years, agree with me. I am, gentlemen, very truly your obedient servant, F. HOPKINSON SMITH."

Next Sunday, the 30th, the exhibition will be open from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and in the evening. The action of the committee will no doubt afford texts for the orthodox preachers and many ultra pious people will pretend to grieve over this sign of ungodliness. But it is safe to say that no one who has the real welfare of the people at heart will be found saying a word against taking this step in the right direction. But if the clergy are wise they will smother their indignation at this "Sabbath desecration," else the people will be tempted to smother them.

Our Respects to Mr. Davis.

In a letter printed page 822 of this issue Mr. E. M. Davis quotes our recent advice to the Anti-monopolists and other reform political parties to attach to their platforms the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and asks why the Liberals do not attach the principles of these various New Forces, as John Swinton designates them, to their platform.

The answer is, they hav.

If Mr. Davis will read the political platform recommended by the last Congress of the National Liberal League, he will find embodied therein substantially the ideas which he considers of paramount importance. This political recommendation was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 6th, of the present year. If Mr. Davis has not preserved his copy of that issue he can nevertheless find it in Mr.

Leland's history of the League in our Annual for 1884.

In the fight for liberty Liberals are always found in the van. Mr. Davis's financial views are very nearly the same that Mr. D. M. Bennett held and promulgated years ago. In Mr. John Swinton's paper, through which Mr. Davis has recently expressed himself, and which has created no little stir in labor circles, we see among the correspondents the names of those whom we hav known for years as stanch Liberals and supporters of THE TRUTH SEEKER, among them being our respected friend E. M. Davis, of Philadelphia.

No, Mr. Davis, Liberals cannot be accused of not being progressiv and broad in their political as well as religious views. The New Forces represented by John Swinton are not up to where the Freethought body was ten years ago. And when these New Forces shall occupy the rearmost positions of the Liberals, the latter will be found almost out of sight ahead.

In effecting the reforms for which Mr. Davis and Mr. Swinton are working they will find the first necessary step to be the breaking of the theological shackles which bind the laboring men. In even so simple a step as joining a labor organization the Catholic is opposed by his church. And who needs to protect himself more than the average ignorant Catholic workman? And yet who does less to help those who are working for his improvement? And why is he so apathetic? Simply and solely because he is bound body and soul by his religion. He is a chattel to the church, a slave to a theocracy.

The people must be free to think before they can be free to act.

The Church and State in France.

For centuries church and state hav been united in France. Under the rule of emperors their relations were very close. The policy steadily pursued by the republican officials, however, has been to finally effect a total separation. Besides secularizing the text books used in the schools, and expelling the Jesuits, the "Budget of Public Worship" has been continuously pared down. The Chambers granted for this year but a little over fifty-one millions of francs. The allowances for cathedrals were reduced, the salaries of nine chaplains of Paris cemeteries and of two canonries of St. Denis were suppressed, together with scholarships in the seminaries. The committee also thought that repairs of furniture of episcopal residences, and the expenses of bishops in installations, visitations, etc., should be disallowed.

That the government showed this much generosity is due not to any sympathy with the church, but because, as M. Ferry expressed it, "old beliefs and usuages must be delicately treated." The Radical wing of the Chambers was not at all satisfied with these small reductions, and in the debate just closed, vigorously demanded that the question of the separation of the church and state should be taken up. To this M. Ferry's reply was that the government was ready to take it up at any time, but the discussion could not lead, he thought, to any practical issue at present. M. Goblet, a moderate Radical, said he would vote for the budget though he wanted separation, but the way for it must be prepared. The suppression of the budget should follow, not precede, the separation of church and state. M. Clemenceau agreed with M. Goblet that the clergy were plainly hostil, and the only remedy was separation. M. Paul Bert said the separation of church and state was the object to be steadily kept in view, but only to be effected as rapidly as prudence permitted. Meantime, the measures adopted by the government had been hailed in the provinces, not as tyrannical and oppressiv, but as just and salutary. The control of the government, in the nomination of bishops and other respects, was far from efficient. It was in this budget of worship that its power really lay. The budget could not be suppressed as long as the Concordat existed. And besides, "if it were suppressed all at once, the faithful would step in and make up the deficit." But, "when only the salary of an individual ecclesiastic is suppressed at once the faithful do not make it up to him." It was to be regretted, however, that only the lower clergy had been punished, and not the bishops who gave the orders. Yet both the state counsel and the Parliament had decided that the minister might equally suspend the salary of a bishop; and such a measure would tend greatly to maintain order and demonstrate the authority of the republic. But there were other means of action, one of which was in the right of disposing of the palaces and edifices devoted to the residence of bishops and the installation of diocesan seminaries. Besides suspending salaries, therefore, they might suspend lodging as well. Thus vast localities might be handed over for the service of public instruction.

"And the advantage would not lie only in taking away their lodging from the bishops, but also in depriving them of the moral authority they derived from inhabiting a palace belonging to the state."

By practicing this policy and preparing the way for separation, the Catholic church might be deprived of all the means of authority which had been conferred on it since the Concordat. But it would never do to leave the church at full liberty in the midst of civil society. That would be a system to which the right of the Chamber would only be too happy to giv its support.

It appears by this discussion in the Chambers that there is really no difference of opinion on the question of separation of church and state. The Right, or conservativ wing, is with the Left in desiring the abolition of state support; it hesitates only as a matter of public policy. The goverment fears the workings of the church; it desires to control it as far as possible. To do this it must hav some hold upon it, and this hold it secures through the Budget of Public Worship. By gradually withdrawing this support the way is prepared for a complete separation without fear of the violent consequences that might ensue should a too sudden change be made. The lower and ignorant strata of French society are still Christian, used to thinking the priests and rulers were appointed by God, and therefore one. The change from an empire to a republic was quite as violent as the slow-moving brain of the peasant can stand in the few years that hav elapsed since the last war, and although the hesitation to divide the religious from the secular is not in keeping with American ideas, it may be better statemanship to pursue the politic course marked out by M. Ferry and M. Paul Bert.

The great changes to be noted are that French public opinion is becoming Freethinking, and that the days of state support for the church are fast drawing to a close.

Our Terms for 1884.

We would again respectfully call the attention of THE TRUTH SEEKER's friends, and Liberals generally, to the low rates at which the paper can be had by a little exertion. Although it has been found necessary to re-establish the old rate of $3 for a single subscription, yet the club rates will be found to be a great reduction in price. For instance: Several hav sent in their renewals, accompanied with four new subscribers, the whole amount necessary to be remitted being $10. If the new subscriptions were taken at $3 that would alone be $12, leaving the getter up of the club $2. If they were taken at $2.50, the movers in the matter obtained their own free. Or if they shared all the advantages of the combination with their friends, they would still be getting theirs at $2—a reduction of 50 cents from this year's price.

We can afford this because when once the type is set the extra copies can be produced at a comparativly small cost. Subscriptions and book sales are all we hav to depend upon for revenue to pay our bills, which on a paper of this size are large, and just as regular as its weekly issue. These extra subscriptions are therefore great aids, and we hope will in time build up our list to that extent that the price of the paper can be permanently lowered, in accordance with the wish of Mr. Bennett, expressed just before his death.

But this club rate virtually accomplishes his purpose—a purpose shared by his successors—of making THE TRUTH SEEKER really the cheapest Liberal paper published. THE TRUTH SEEKER has done a great and good work in the few years of its existence in freeing people's minds from the fetters of superstition. We hope and intend that it shall do more in the years to come. To do this the paper must be widely circulated; to be widely circulated, it must be cheap, for the qualities of mind that lead to independence are not the qualities that accumulate wealth, and thousands of free thinking men and women are too poor to pay a high price for a paper.

We think our club rates effect this, and we ask our subscribers who are renewing their own subscriptions to look about and see if a few friends will not join with them. By doing this they will save money for themselvs, help THE TRUTH SEEKER very materially, and advance the cause of mental liberty in this country.

To the Liberals of New York and Vicinity.

George Chainey, the distinguished Freethought orator, purposes to deliver a series of monthly lectures in this city, Sunday evenings, at German Masonic Hall, 220 E. 15th street, under the auspices of the Liberal Club. It is earnestly hoped that the Liberals of New York and vicinity will cordially respond to this effort. The enlarging prospects of Freethought on every side make necessary renewed exertion, in order that its best fruits may appear. Its eloquent presentation upon the platform is one of those means by which its greatest triumphs are won. Let all who are interested in this important work do what they can for the success of these lectures, which embrace the most living and advanced topics of the hour.

The Legends of Genesis.

The Rev. R. Heber Newton has delivered another lecture concerning the book of Genesis. For an Episcopal minister, yet untried for heresy, he talks boldly. Speaking of the tradition of Abram, Sarah, and Hagar, whom Sarah gave to Abram to wife, Mr. Newton said: "Strange and revolting as it is to us, such motherhood by proxy was once an unobjectionable custom. Hebrew women regarded childlessness as a reproach, which they were ready to wipe out by even such a remedy. Custom and the sense of duty reconciled them to sharing the affections of their husbands, much, I suppose, as the Mormon women put down the strong instinct of womanhood before a supposed religious obligation. But with what fine touches the writers of these stories bring out the inevitable jealousy and strife and domestic bitterness that entered the tents of the patriarchs with each successiv wife. Our Mormon friends might well read, mark, and inwardly digest these biblical examples of the woes of being too much married.

"In this passage occurs the first mention of 'angels' visits,' which, in these traditions, are neither few nor far between. Beautiful as are these visions of superhuman beings appearing visibly to men, and walking, talking, eating, and drinking with them, it is vain to disguise from ourselvs that such visions are only had in a world other than that we know and tread. Child races alone hav seen these visions in which child souls alone can believe. Communications may be had from the spirit world to the human spirits bodied in the flesh, and these tales may be only the poetic forms of such Spiritualistic experiences as seem to come to us again in our own age—experiences whose reality we are not prepared as yet either to affirm or to deny.

"The origin of the rite of circumcision, by which the Hebrews dedicated their children to Jehovah, seems to hav arisen out of a compromise with the dreadful rite of dedicating children to death as offerings to the gods. The custom marked an immense step forward out of darkness in which early nations were shrouded.

"The story of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah is legendary, and we see in its incidents the memory of some volcanic upheaval which submerged the cities of the plain beneath the then formed Dead Sea, and the superstitious fancies suggested by the oppressiv surroundings of that mysterious lake and by the fantastic figurings of its salt-encrusted, rocky shores. The revolting story appended to this legend may probably be saved from this abominableness as a tale of real life by the legendary character of the traditions with which we are now dealing."

Of the story of Abraham taking Isaac to sacrifice, Mr. Newton said: "It points to the early ages, when children were sacrificed in religious rites, and celebrates the resistance of the father to the horrible custom because he listens to and obeys the voice of God—not a voice outside of himself, but a voice within him. In some hour of sore need, when fate seemed to go against a man, when every power of nature combined to crush him, he would hear the suggestion, 'The gods are angry; they must be placated; they call for blood'—and then he would hear a voice within him as of Jehovah saying, 'Take now thy son, thine only son, whom thou lovest, and offer him.' Thus around some tradition of the patriarch Abraham this story wove itself out of the heart of a people. It vibrates with the quiverings of hosts of hearts, and thrills with the agony of a tortured race, but of a tortured people taught to see that Jehovah wished not for the sacrifice of human blood, and was content with the blood of rams and goats."

A Leaflet from Baron Munchausen.

It is estimated the London Society for Promoting Christianity among Jews, founded in 1809, has been the means of converting 100,000 of that people. The society has placed in their hands 2,000,000 copies of the New Testament in Hebrew. There are now 2,000 Jewish Christians in London, and probably 1,000 more in other parts of the kingdom.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

We hav no hesitancy in pronouncing the above an unmitigated falsehood. The statement implies an average annual conversion of 1,350 Jews. We challenge any truthful Christian to show the names of 1,350 Jews converted during the past ten years. Our Christian friends should remember the fate of Ananias and Sapphira.—Hebrew Standard.

No one will attempt to prove that the closing of libraries and picture galleries on Sundays keeps the bad places of New York shut also.—Springfield Republican.

And no one but a fool will attempt to show that closing the libraries and art galleries on Sunday will lessen the attendance at the bad places.

Liberal or Bigot, Which?

Christian sectarians are apt to oppose, rather than contribute, time, means, and influence to sustain any organization, however beneficial and much needed, unless it is controled by themselvs, and devoted to the propagation of their denominational creed and pet notions.

They claim to desire the promotion of human happiness, talk glibly of affording to all every possible social and educational advantage, but unless it tends to the upholding of their peculiar tenet and pet hobby they will not alone refuse to take part, but generally oppose and denounce.

Christians are excusable in this—nay, in a measure justified; for it is the inevitable outgrowth of their creed, of their faith in the divine inspiration of the Bible, which commands them, "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou nor thy fathers: Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth, even unto the other end of the earth. Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him, neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt shou conceal him. But thou shalt surely kill him, thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death and afterwards the hand of all the people. And thou shalt stone him with stones that he die" (Deut. xiii, 6–10).

Some Christians claim to find great consolation in the idea that this was the old law, but now we are living under the new and better law of Jesus, the blessed gospel dispensation which declares, "But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that we hav preached unto you, let him be accursed. As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 8, 9).

Should Liberals pursue such a course it would be denounced as vile, stupid, inconsistent—and so it would be, for they hav no such "sole rule of faith and practice" to excuse or justify them.

Materialists and Spiritualists alike claim to be Liberals. They profess to award and desire to secure to every other the same right and freedom of opinion, and giv credit for the same honesty of purpose that they claim for themselvs. The majority really do this. But unfortunately a change of theological opinions does not always effect a change of disposition. The worldling who was a mean skinflint, converted only becomes a stingy Christian. The pompous dogmatist is still the bigot, although he claims to hav forsaken his creed, and loudly boasts of his Liberalism. With some it needs line upon line, precept upon precept, diligent study and reading of that very best of humanizers and Liberal educators, THE TRUTH SEEKER, ere the old leaven is eradicated, and the nobler, better nature developed.

There are those who remain bigoted fanatics while imagining themselvs the best of Liberals. Such persons evince no appreciation of the good done, no sympathy with the self-sacrificing efforts made, by others to advance the cause, unless they will ride the same hobby as themselvs. Profession amounts to little; words are cheap froth; our acts prove us either Liberals or bigots. The true Liberal, in the fullest, truest, noblest definition of that term, is ready, not alone to appreciate the good, but eager to help any and every honest effort to advance scientific truth, promote human happiness, and secure universal mental liberty. And when opportunity presents itself will readily set aside, for the time being, the most dearly cherished hobby, and work earnestly for the greatest good to the greatest number.

The cause of Liberalism is deeply indebted to Spiritualists for their noble work in fearlessly exposing the fallacies and pernicious influences of Christian creeds and dogmas; and equally so to Materialists for their diffusion of scientific knowledge and self-sacrificing efforts in behalf of Freethought and civil and religious liberty and equality.

Both Materialists and Spiritualists believe all that is of love is good; all that is of hate is evil; that sin or wrong consists in doing or wilfully permitting injury to any fellow-creature or sensitiv thing; that virtue, or right, consists in using every possible means to promote the happiness and best good of every fellow-creature; administering to the wants of the poor and needy as far as they possibly can, without doing greater injury to themselvs, or those having a prior claim upon their bounty and benevolence, than they confer benefit on the recipient of their charity.

Materialists realize the good a man does livs after him, and the necessity of diligently striving to do right, promoting human happiness, overcoming evil with good, relieving and soothing the overburdened and sorrowing, and bringing joy and sunshine into hearts around them, for they thus secure a heaven in the present; and their only hope of immortality is to so act that they shall liv in the dear affections of loved ones who survive them.

Spiritualists believe in the necessity of attaining the highest possible mental and moral development, in unceasing ministrations of love, mercy, and benevolence; that they may thus attain a rich experience, a higher plane from which to start in spirit-land, and so be better qualified to more effectually minister to their loved on earth.

In short, both equally desire to make the greatest possible advancement in knowledge, truth, goodness, and usefulness here and now.

Both are alike opposed to fraud, hypocrisy, cant, and creeds.

Both dearly love, earnestly desire, and are willing to work hard and giv generously for, the advancement of universal mental liberty.

Both are equally hated, misrepresented, calumniated, and persecuted by the orthodox Christian churches.

Both equally suffer from the unscrupulous usurpation of power by Christian priests and deprivations of rights under Christian laws.

Both are equally peace-makers among the churches, for let either Materialist or Spiritualist lecturer be announced either in village or city, and, although the pastors and lay members of the various churches hav been at daggers drawn, quarreling over their denominational doctrins, they speedily become the very dearest and most loving of friends and co-laborers. All their feuds are for the time laid aside, their differences of opinion and faith ignored and never mentioned, while they unite in every sort of scheme and cunning device to keep people away from the Liberal lecturer, lest, hearing, they should be convinced of the truth, and forsake the old church.

Why should not liberals of all shades of opinion be united in the great and noble work of disenthralment of honest hearts from the meshes of superstition, slavish fear, and priestcraft?

Unite in educating the children in the glorious, ennobling truths of science. In cultivating love of nature, the study of her laws, and inciting a spirit of emulation in self-sacrificing efforts to secure universal mental liberty.

Why not leave pet theories, hobbies, and side issues, until the great and grand reform is accomplished; until friends and neighbors hav been afforded every facility to investigate the truth for themselvs? When we hav done our full duty in providing the means of emancipation for our friends from the thraldrom of superstition and priestcraft, when we hav afforded the much needed educational and social advantages to our children, then we can, with every prospect of success, attempt proselyting to our pet theory. And by evincing more real benevolence, gentleness, and love; greater self-sacrifice, more of patience, fortitude, and energy under difficulties and affliction than any others, insure an eager desire on the part of all to learn of that pet theory or belief that so enables us to do and to endure.

But to-day our dearest friends, our relativs, our children, are in need of educational and social advantages, to enable them to attain to better, more useful, and happier lives.

To-day we need unity of action and purpose—association—so that we may make united efforts to help honest hearts to struggle up out of the bogs of superstition and fanaticism.

To-day we need system and unity of action in bringing the light of truth to the people, by circulating our most powerful advocate and educator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, and other first-class Liberal papers, pamphlets, tracts, and books, so that intelligent investigators may be added to our ranks.

Shall we make united efforts to secure these great desiderata, or neglect and refuse to co-operate because our pet theory or ism is not made the Alpha and Omega. Are we Liberals or bigots, which? Let our acts giv the answer.

Rochester, N. Y. CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

Paul's Voyage to Rome.

"And as the storm raged violently upon us, we the next day threw goods into the sea. And on the third day, with our own hands, we threw away the tackling of the ship. And as the storm held on for many days, and as no sun was visible, nor moon nor stars, all hope of our surviving was wholly cut off. And as no one had taken a meal of food, Paul now stood up in the midst of them and said: If ye had given heed to me, O men, we should not hav sailed from Crete, and we should hav been exempt from this loss and peril" (18–21).

From this it appears that Paul wanted to remain at Lasea, but was overruled by the pilot and centurion and a majority of the passengers, who wanted to go to Phenix, about fifty miles westward.

"And now I counsel you to be without anxiety; for not a soul of you will be lost, but only the ship" (22).

Had Paul forgotten that at Fair Havens he predicted not only much loss of cargo but of lives? Or was that a mistake of the reporter?

"For there appeared to me this night the angel of that God whose I am, and whom I serve, and he said to me, Fear not, Paul, for thou art yet to stand before Cæsar; and lo, God hath made a gift to thee of all them that sail with thee. Therefore, men, be ye courageous; for I confide in God, that it will be as was told to me. Yet we are to be cast upon a certain island. And after the fourteen days of our roaming and tossing on the Adriatic Sea, at midnight the sailors conceived that they had approached land" (23–27).

The sea of Adrias in those days was not the gulf of Venice, but what was known as the sea of Ionia in more ancient times; it extended half-way across the Mediterranean, to Crete and Malta.

"And they cast the lead and found twenty fathoms. And again they advanced a little, and they found fifteen fathoms. And as we feared lest we should be caught in places where were rocks, they cast four anchors from the stern of the ship, and prayed for the morning. And the sailors sought to flee out of the ship. And from it they lowered down the boat into the sea, under pretense that they were going in it to make fast the ship to the land. And when Paul saw it he said to the centurion and soldiers, Unless these remain in the ship ye cannot be saved" (28–31).

Why should he hav said this, after the angel had told him that not a soul should be lost anyhow?

"Then the soldiers cut the boat-rope from the ship, and let the boat go adrift. And while it was not yet morning, Paul advised them all to take food to them. In consequence of the peril it is now the fourteenth day that ye hav tasted nothing" (32, 33).

A fast of fourteen days by a whole ship's crew and passengers is altogether incredible, even after what we know of Dr. Tanner's forty day's fast.

"Therefore I entreat you to take food for the sustenance of your life; for not a hair of the head of any of you will perish. And having said these things he took bread and gave glory to God before them all; and he broke it and began to eat" (34, 35).

The Greek word eucharisteo, "giv thanks," occurs here, and again in Acts xxviii, 15; and eucharistia, "thankfulness," in xxiv, 3. But the Syriac has a different word in these three passages, whereas in Acts ii, 42, and xx, 7, the Syriac has euchristia, while the Greek has a different word. Eucharisteo and eucharistia occur quite often in the Greek version of Paul's epistles, but no such corresponding word in the Syriac is there found.

A curious instance of the transfer of Greek words into the Syriac is in the second epistle of John, which has the word Antichristus, "Antichrist," while in the first epistle daga meshipa, "false messiah," occurs four times. The early Syriac New Testament had only the first epistle of John, but the Greek, Syriac, and Latin versions originated about the same time.

"And they were all consoled; and they took nourishment. And there were of us in the ship two hundred and seventy-six souls. And when they were satisfied with food they lightened the ship, and took the wheat and cast it into the sea. And when it was day the sailors knew not what land it was; but they saw on the land an inlet of the sea, whither, if possible, they intended to drive the ship. And they cut away the anchors from the ship, and left them in the sea. And they loosened the bands of the rudder and hoisted a small sail to the breeze, and made way toward the land. And the ship struck upon a shoal between two channels of the sea, and stuck fast upon it. And the forward part rested upon it, and was immovable; but the after part was shattered by the violence of the waves. And the soldiers were disposed to slay the prisoners, lest they should resort to swimming and escape from them. But the centurion kept them from it because he was desirous to preserve Paul. And those who were able to swim he commanded to swim off first and pass to the land. And the rest he made to transport themselvs on planks and on other timbers of the ship. And so they all escaped safe to land. And we afterward learned that the island was called Melita" (36, xxviii, 1).

The Vulgate has Mitylene, but it is changed to Melita in the Douay. Mitylene was the chief town of the island of Lesbos, seven hundred miles north-east of Malta, which answers to Melita.

"And the barbarians who inhabited it showed us many kindnesses. And they kindled a fire and called us all to warm ourselvs, because of the great rain and cold at that time. And Paul took up a bundle of fagots and laid them on the fire; and a viper, driven by the heat, came out of them and bit [Gr., fastened on] his hand. And when the barbarians saw it hanging on his hand they said: Doubtless this man is a murderer, whom, though delivered from the sea, justice will not suffer to liv. But Paul shook his hand, and threw the viper into the fire; and he received no harm. And the barbarians expected that he would suddenly swell and fall dead to the ground. And when they had looked a long time and saw that he received no harm, they changed their language and said that he was a god. And there were lands in that quarter belonging to a man named Publius, who was the chief man of the island; and he cheerfully received us at his house three days" (xxviii, 2–7).

The identity of Malta with Melita is unquestionable. Smith's Bible Dictionary says:

"Its chief officer, under the governor of Sicily, appears from inscriptions to hav had the title of protos Melitaion, or Primus Melitensium, and this is the very phrase which St. Luke uses" (xxviii, 7).

But about Chief Man Publius (Gr. Poplios) we know nothing.

"And the father of Publius was sick with a fever and dysentery. And Paul went in to him and prayed, and laid his hand on him, and healed him. And after this event others also in the island who were sick came to him and were healed. And they honored us with great honors; and when we left the place they supplied us with necessaries. And after three months we departed, sailing in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the island, and which bore the signal of the Twins [Gr. Dioskourois, 'sons of Jove,' i. e., Castor and Pollux]. And we came to the city of Syracuse [in Sicily], and remained there three days. And from there we made a circuit and arrived at the city of Rhegium [on the toe of Italy]. And after one day the south wind blew favorably for us, and in two days we came to Puteoli, a city of Italy. And there we found brethren, and they invited us, and we remained with them seven days; and then we proceeded toward Rome" (8–14).

Potioloi is the Greek for Puteoli.

"The earlier name of Puteoli, when the lower part of Italy was Greek, was Dicæarchea, and this name continued to be used to a late period. Joseph uses it in three passages. . . . There were Jewish residents at Puteoli. We might be sure of this from its mercantile importance; but we are positivly informed of it by Josephus (Ant. xvii, 12, § 1) in his account of the visit of the pretended Herod Alexander to Augustus, and the circumstance shows how natural it was that the apostle should find Christian 'brethren' there immediately on landing" (McCl. and Str. Cyc.).

And now we will transcribe what Josephus says about his own voyage to Rome, A.D. 62 or 63.

"Accordingly I came to Rome, though it were through a great number of hazards by sea; for as our ship was drowned in the Adriatic Sea [Acts xxvii, 27], we that were in it, being about six hundred [?] in number, swam for our lives all night; when upon the first appearance of day, and upon our sight of a ship of Cyrene, I and some others, eighty in all, by God's providence prevented [i. e., got before] the rest, and were taken up into the other ship. And when I had thus escaped, and was come to Dicearchia, which the Italians call Puteoli, I became acquainted with Aliturius, an actor of plays, and much beloved by Nero, but a Jew by birth; and through his interest became known to Poppea, Cæsar's wife, and took care as soon as possible to entreat her to procure that the priests might be set at liberty. And when, besides this favor, I had obtained many presents from Poppea, I returned home again" (Life § 3).

If we accept as truthful all the details of the book of Acts, together with the marginal chronology, then we hav the following striking coincidences between the voyage of Paul and that of Josephus:

Acts of the Apostles.	Autobiography of Josephus.
Paul, the great apostle, a pharisee and a prophet, sailed from Judea to Rome, in the year 62 and 63 A.D., to appear before Nero Cæsar, with certain other prisoners, put in bonds by Felix. The voyage was perilous, and the ship was wrecked in the sea of Adrias.	Josephus, the historian, a Pharisee and a priest, sailed from Judea to Rome, in the year 62 or 63 A.D., to appear before Nero Cæsar, to plead for certain priests, sent in bonds by Felix. The voyage was perilous, and the ship was wrecked in the sea of Adrias.

But if Paul sailed, as we believe, some time between 22 and 12 B.C., either as a missionary, or on an appeal to Augustus Cæsar from the judgment of Marcus V. Agrippa, the coincidences are not remarkable.

Letters from Friends.

MR. EDITOR: While plastering a house last fall this question occurred to my mind: When Jesus went to prepare his many mansions did he hav them plastered? And if so, did he mix the mud himself and carry it two flights of stairs? W. H. SLOANE.

GRANDIN, DAK., Dec. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I shall leave here in January to spend the winter in the warmer climate of California. After I return I will send you my subscription for a year. I will do all I can to advance your paper and the cause of truth while I stop in California. I shall hav no other business. C. B. JOHNS.

OXFORD, Dec. 14, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, for which send me one copy of Billings's "Crimes of Preachers," a copy of the Truth Seeker Annual, and apply the balance to THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the very best Freethought journals printed.

Yours respectfully, O. F. DELANO.

STRASBURG, ILL., Dec. 11, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I send you a communication from the Windsor Advocate. The picture is true. Do you think the church folks ought to get mad about it? The churches are one-quarter of a mile apart, one a Campbellite and the other Methodist, and of course the Christian spirit prevented them from worshiping in the same house. Your paper and little tracts are doing good work here, but it is slow and steady.

The Children's Department is worth the other 50 cents or more, so the price of the paper will not be any higher next year than this. A. YORK.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, Dec. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.35—$2.50 for renewal of our subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 25 cents for the new Liberal Almanac (when published), and 60 cents for "Curious Life of P. B. Randolph," by himself.

The Salvation Army "opened fire on the devil's stronghold," as they expressed it, a month ago, and are still firing away, having one to five meetings daily. They remind one of the "howling dervishes" described by our Bennett in his journey around the world. They hav wrested a few souls from the devil's grasp. Sincerely yours, J. and A. E. KIRK.

SLIP DOWN MOUNTAIN, TEXAS, Dec. 3, 283.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethought movement in this vicinity is doing as well as could be expected under existing circumstances. A few of us met at a country place known as the Alamo School House on the 25th of August, and organized a society under the name of "The Alamo Truth Seekers." We enrolled ten members at the first meeting, and hav since added three, and there are "more to follow." We organized about the close of a Methodist protracted meeting, the members of which were very much concerned about the matter, and they hav been holding prayer-meetings in the neighborhood twice a week ever since, offering up many petitions, I am told, to their bloodthirsty God for the removal of Infidels and Infidelity from this part of the universe. But he is either too old and deaf to hear, or else has more important business with which to occupy his time, as none of their prayers has been answered yet that anybody knows of.

The denomination of Christians commonly known as Campbellites procured an experienced minister, for whose services I am told they paid a round $100, to come into this "wicked neighborhood" to knock off a few of the thickest scales from the eyes of us "poor, benighted, ignorant, and wicked Infidels." He proved to be a braggadocio kind of speaker, and greatly disgusted most of his hearers, except perhaps a few of the most devout of his own flock. Consequently he accomplished next to nothing. He made more skeptics than converts. He took the ground, as all the others do, that his denomination were the elect. But I hav written enough, and will close. Yours for truth, J. S. WHITE.

CLEVELAND, O., Dec. 9, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: To-day our League held an interesting meeting. The Hon. A. B. Bradford delivered his celebrated lecture: "What the World, and Especially the Freethinker, Owes to Martin Luther." He is an interesting speaker, and delivered his lecture in his own eloquent and graceful manner. I would advise every Leakue and Freethought society to procure Mr. Bradford to deliver his lecture. It drew by far the largest attendance we hav had since our organization, some two months ago.

Our League has made its influence felt in Liberal lines in this community, and we expect to hav some of the leading lights of the Liberal cause lecture here soon. J. E. Remsburg will be here soon, and others are partlally arranged for. I hope to receive communications from more lecturers wishing to speak here, or from those passing near here during the coming months, with a view of arranging for lectures.

We hav a large Liberal population in the city, and we need to agitate a little to get them into our organization. It has been estimated at 10,000; but I think that includes many who are still church-members, but of liberal opinions. If we go on with our agitation we can get a list of 400—probably 600 or 700—if we but hav the aid of several good speakers. I am sorry I hav not a list of speakers with their terms. But I think we will be better arranged for a lecture bureau by next season. Yours in the cause of liberty and the League, W. I. IRVINE.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., Dec. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: After reading your paper for the first time, which was given to me by a friend, I was filled with wonder and delight to find so many recruits to the army of liberty. I am convinced that orthodox religion has about run its race.

I also feel it incumbent upon me to giv a brief sketch of my experience. Having once been a Baptist preacher, and having learned the hypocrisy of almost the entire church membership, I began to be suspicious about the cause. I found the Bible the support of almost every conceivable crime, filled with fables, subterfuges, quibbles, and corruption, all in the name of God. It is unfit for the mind to contemplate. How in the world men and women hav advanced to such a state of civilization and morality with such a book for a guide is the greatest wonder in the world to me. I hav grasped the sword of the iconoclast, and am willing to use it with all my power. Though I hav a poor chance, having five motherless children to support by working for seventy-five cents per day, I hav tried to get the editors of our county papers to publish for me a challenge to any to debate the doctrins of the Bible with me, but was refused. Despised and dreaded, I challenge, I reason, I argue with all I meet, abusing none. I hav begun a book, which I hope will be one of the clearest and most indisputable tests and formidable foes of all revealed religions, and a powerful evidence that there is no God, no devil, no soul, and no future heaven or hell. I desire very much to be with Mr. Chainey or some of our iconoclasts.

Yours with interest, J. N. MAXEY.

WARRENSBURGH, Dec. 2, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please place my name on your list for twelve months, as I intend to take your paper as long as I can get a dollar to spare. I became a reader of your valuable paper last March by calling on a friend of mine at Glens Falls, and now the scales are almost all off from my eyes, and I can see clearly enough to keep out of the way of the Methodist priest. I hav been a member of the Methodist church for twenty years, believing in a hell and a heaven, and a merciful and avenging God. But now all that is vanished and gone. There are some six or eight persons here in this village who are Freethinkers, whom I hav conversed with on the subject of Infidelity and the inspiration of the Bible. They consider that work all myth, fable, and senseless dogma. They hav read my paper, and think it is a grand publication. I hav tried to persuade them to subscribe for the paper, but their wives and parents are such good Christians that they hesitate on those grounds. Oh, how I would like to hav some good Freethinker come here in this village and giv one or two good lectures! But I do not see any way to get one. They could not come without pay, and there are so many Christians and churches and so much religion here that it would be hard to try to get a speaker to come here. There are four churches here.

I received the package of "False Claims" all right. I sent for them in order to help the Freethinkers' cause. I shall distribute these pamphlets where I think they will do some good to the cause. I do wish that some of the good lecturers would happen this way, and the news would get out that Mr. Ingersoll, or Mr. Remsburg, or Mr. Watts, or some one was going to address the people of this place on the subject of Freethought. I think that there would be a full house and that it would pay well.

Find inclosed a post-office note for subscription one year from date. WM. WILCOX.

MT. VERNON, IND., Dec. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Friend in our common cause—excuse my verbosity—and this kind of paper too. I used to write for knights of the quill, and hav some of their paper still.

How can we deny evolution when THE TRUTH SEEKER steadily grows better? I mean no harm, but do not Spiritualists and Materialists, in their discussions through your columns, conceal their ideas by a superabundance of words? Why not reveal them by omitting many adjectivs and all superfluous words? I hav no evidence showing that inorganic matter can think. But spirit begins to manifest and individualize itself in very low forms. You say gravitation rounds worlds and dew-drops. Does it mold snow-crystals into their geometric forms, such as crosses, wheels, and stars? Does it determin the shapes of quartz and other mineral crystals? You may call it a "property" of matter that molds frosts on your windows into forms resembling ferns, etc. "What's in a name?" The fact remains. What property of matter forces a common pole-bean (white) to always turn to the left in its spiral ascent? Water in small vessels begins to freeze from the circumference, and coalesces near the center. The sutures and "soft spot" in the human skull solidify by a process very similar, if not identical. Why do carnivorous plants reject pebbles and bits of chalk, but retain and digest pieces of meat and insects? If spirit does not exist beneath and before us, above and beyond us, why do animals (quadrupeds) display so much intelligence, and dreams so much prophetic significance? I, in common with many others, hav had dreams that were literally verified. If the human mind is wiser while asleep than while awake, I will risk being able to dream after I am dead.

I will condense my ideas.

EVOLUTION OF MIND.

Form after form the budding soul assumes,
Aspiring through the ages and the years
To catch the human; there at last it blooms,
A candidate for life in spirit spheres.

CHARLES O. ROWE.

WARM SPRINGS, WY., Dec. 8, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, which credit to the subscription of Jones & Williams.

Though unaccustomed to letter-writing, I should like to add a few words to our prohibition Liberals. Some of you prohibitionists forget, in your zeal for your cause, what is due some of the rest of us who do not see this matter in the same light that you do. Just because we cannot reason from your standpoint, you retaliate by calling us "whisky-soaked Liberals." Some of you even assert that some of our Liberal lecturers are too fond of their bitters, because they are too clear-headed to be prohibitionists! I would feebly suggest that our Liberal friends be not so liberal with their epithets. We are not Philistines, but good temperance people; so don't try to slay us with your jawbone, as Samson of old is said to hav done! Talk about the bigoted Christians! How much better are you, who will not tolerate a difference of opinion on this subject? Though I detest drunkenness as much as any other woman, yet I cannot see that prohibition will stop whisky-drinking, for men who were born with, or hav acquired, a love for whisky, will hav it, prohibition or no prohibition.

Kansas is a bright and shining example. They hav plenty of prohibition there, and prohibition whisky, too, and drunken brawls are not as infrequent as they should be, yet they are hushed up and kept from the papers as much as possible by the prohibitionists, just as a church congregation hush up the "indiscretions" of their pastor. And what a harvest the druggists hav! There are a great many men who will drink to show legislators that they cannot with impunity put restrictions on their individual rights. For that all men hav an inalienable right to eat and drink what they please, all honest-minded people must admit. One writer says, "If the women had full sway we would soon see a reform in this direction," and I admit that ninety-nine out of every one hundred women would vote for prohibition, simply because their sympathies are that way; they would not look at the principle of it; and so would as large a percentage of the men vote against opium-eating, arsenic-eating, and other kindred vices in which a great many women indulge. But my letter is already too long, so I will close. Many who read this will say, "Well, what matter? she is only a woman." But I will humbly add, My vote in this territory counts just as much as any man's.

FLORENCE B. JONES.

LESLIE, Dec. 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3—2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and for the balance send Remsburg's "False Claims," for missionary work. As a lot of stout looking men hav started in for their grand harvest, I want to throw a little damper on their false claims. They look like a lot of streaked snakes after swallowing a big bull frog.

I must say I am very much interested in Miss Wixon's stories in THE TRUTH SEEKER. They are splendid. MRS. SARAH A. HAYNES.

NORTH WOLCOTT, Dec. 4, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.25 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months. I am very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and regard it as the greatest defender of science and humanity in circulation.

I read with great interest S. P. Putnam's article, "The Problem of the Universe and its Scientific Solution." And I think that it is the most clear and logical agument I ever read on the subject. Anxiously awaiting for the next number of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

I am very truly yours, C. H. BETTS.

BELLEVILLE, Dec. 5, 283.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $20.50, with list of truth seekers' names at your club rates. Wish I could make it tenfold more than it is. Will try and add yet to the number of such as may be seeking salvation through the truth, for "thy word is truth."

Truly the harvest is ripe, but the laborers are few. And what few we hav here, hav, for the past four years, patiently borne all manner of slander and abuse, with lies and vilification in abundance thrown in gratuitously. But, thanks to the aid of such help as the matchless TRUTH SEEKER, the grand old Investigator, and other Liberal papers, we hav made good headway; we hav lived down and risen above the flood of orthodox persecution, and now hav the satisfaction of seeing one "Joss-house" closed, the other crippled, and her children "begging bread" (knowledge, truth). While, for the "one live Atheist in town," four years ago, they are now numbered by the score. Aye; the world does move, and we are moving with it. Giv us but a fulcrum on which to place our lever, and we will move the world.

Truly yours, H. PATRICK, M.D.

MOUNT UNION, Dec. 7, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: You doubtless remember the old story of the dispute between philosophers as to the true color of the chamelion, and the decision of the judge in that famous case, was, "You all are right, and all are wrong."

I wonder if the dispute between TRUTH SEEKER philosophers is not more about terms of expression than things. Our vocabulary hardly keeps up to the march of discovery in science.

All Spiritualists agree, I presume, in the belief that a spirit will necessarilly be something or nothing. The mere invisibility of a substance does not prove it to be non-existent. Spirit and matter! What is the difference, only that one is, so to speak, objectiv, and the other subjectiv. We are surrounded by both, of course; the only question being, I suppose, whether the human spirit goes on—I will not say forever, for that I do not know anything about.

We say, "One world at a time," but does not every successful effort to improve, rather to increase, the magnifying power of scopic lenses, reveal new worlds, not only among the stars but in plant and animal life? The hero of "Two on a Tower," in the Atlantic Monthly, speaks of the point where "investigation stops, and ghastliness begins" in astronomy. But when once discovery sheds its welcome light, ghastliness ceases. So the war of evolution goes on between light, order, grisly darkness, and chaos.

Who can tell what will be the next thing to come to the front out of the awful unknown sea we call empty space (as if there could be such a thing)? The worlds are all mingled together as they whirl on their way. But in the sense of the present and future life, as generally understood, that is all right.

In regard to the actual presence with us, of human spirits who hav passed the change called death, and their power, under certain conditions, to make their presence evident to our senses, one of your correspondents says, "We hav no more reason to believe in a future than in a past existence." Of course man has had a past existence, from the time he first, as a blister on the surface of our globe when it was in a state of fusion, as some French savant has it, till he struggled up to the condition of infusion, and on and on till he appears as the present grand creature we adore and scold.

If, however, he means a past existence similar to the present, I would say, like Candace in the minister's wooing, that if I'd been there I'm sure I should "'member it," and if I did distinctly "'member it," I should maintain the fact. And be you sure that if a beloved spirit out of the greatness of his love, without the intervention of a "medium," entirely unexpected and unhoped for, appears to me visibly, under circumstances to make denial of his presence impossible, I will maintain that fact at the possible risk of appearing rude to any number of people, though it would pain me greatly to appear in that light to your charming circle of truth seekers. I freely admit that what is evidence to one is not necessarily so to another, but when that other declares in the face of the testimony of thousands, the most honest and intelligent, that they hav had no such evidence as I hav referred to, he goes quite beyond his reckoning.

One good brother says, "Read Mr. Winter's letter, and then study the laws of nature." Just so! but I prefer to study them first and last—all the time for that matter. Mr. Winter's letter is very nice, but I fail to see the conviction. To me there are two ways of getting at those laws, the clear eye and loving heart, or I might say intuition, and patient, careful, life-long study of science. But after spending years in the fumes of retort and crucible, straining the eyes till they refuse the light, over plant, flower, animal, insect, etc., and I will add months in the horrors of the dissecting-room, and following the course of the scalpel in the hands of a surgeon, they who try it on will possibly be surprised at the meagerness of the results. Some of us "ignorant Spiritualists" tried it with all the zeal of martyrs, at great loss of health, money, and time, and were forced to exclaim, "The mystery only deepens."

That "conscious soul of the universe" is a lovely thing to dream over, and who can help such dreams? But the dreamer runs the risk of being stricken blind if he boldly attempts to fathom the unfathomable. E. A. W.

FORT WORTH, TEXAS, Dec. 3, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I take pleasure in ordering another "Apocryphal New Testament." The work is utterly unknown in this part of the moral vinyard, and almost the first party I exhibited it to requested me to let him hav it for his wife to read. As a matter of course, I consented, and the result was he bought it; consequently I must hav another copy. It seems to be a powerful pleader for the good cause of Liberalism.

We need some good Liberal lecturers in this section. There is no question but the result would be gratifying in all respects. People here are slowly, but not the less surely, becoming aware that they hav been most egregiously swindled and blinded in the unhappy past, and their awakening will be all the more thorough and demoralizing to the priestly clan who hav held them so long in spiritual and mental bondage.

The more I examin the silly stories on which this bogus Christianity is based, the more I am convinced they are lies manufactured from the whole cloth by the early fathers of holy mother church. Even admitting the existence of a personal God, anything contrary to the immutable laws of nature must evidently be a lie. Certainly we see nature now and then indulge in certain curious freaks, but are we to suppose divine inspiration, or supernaturalism, or the miraculous thereby? Am I to believe that a solid rock opens simply at the intercession of a mere woman, however virtuous, however sincere her pious ejaculations may be? Being contrary to nature's laws, the event, no matter by whom recorded, stamps itself as a lie on the first glance. How absurd to suppose the salvation of my soul is depending on my implicit belief in such trash! Happy would it be for mankind were they to let the supernatural rest undisturbed, employing their minds with what more immediately concerns them. This world and its attendant duties is all-sufficient; we need search no farther to hav our time fully and profitably employed. And to think that by these silly fancies hav designing priests led mankind, yea, these many centuries. Let us hope, however, that the time is approximating when, the mists of superstition and ignorance finally swept away, a happier, more intelligent era will dawn for the emancipation of mankind. Nothing givs me greater delight than to perplex a good Christian with some puzzling question which he can only solve by an appeal to that oft-repeated answer, "Oh, that is the mystery of godliness; we are not allowed to probe too deep into such matters." And if not, why and wherefore? may I modestly inquire. Being rational creatures, we are compelled to examin, analyze, and determin for ourselvs, else why were we endowed with mental faculties? Those failing to eliminate the truth, from whom are we to receive it? From the priests? Why, it is a world-wide and established fact that it is for the interest of the clergy of any and all denominations to lie, dissimulate, and defraud, that they may wax fat and prosperous in the land they encumber and disgrace.

Not long ago a devout believer made the assertion in my presence that the Bible was positivly without a flaw. Well, let us take the recorded origin of the human family as an instance. There being only one single pair to commence with, it follows as an imperativ necessity that the sons and daughters of our first parents must necessarily commit incest in order to obey the first behest of Jehovah. He said, "Multiply and replenish the earth." How? Why, by incestuous intercourse, of course. Is this consistent with nature? Is it not, in effect, repugnant to every dictate of nature, morality, and decency? Is it consistent with the idea any pure-minded person would conceive of the character of a pure and spotless God? Remember that for the sake of the argument we are admitting the existence of a personal God; in short, the Old Testament Jehovah, pure and undefiled! And he imposes incestuous intercourse as the inexorable necessity of obeying his commands at the very outset! Is there no flaw in that? Can anything be more absurd, more debasing, more humiliating, more wretchedly preposterous than such a supposition as to the possible character of God? If such ideas of God do not disgust the Christian when once it is presented to him in its true aspect, logic is thrown away. We must work on the coming generation. Those who are so hopelessly wedded to their superstitions are beyond the barriers. We may deplore their ignorance; we can never expect to convert them to the hosts of Liberalism.

I wish Col. Robert Ingersoll could pay Fort Worth a visit this winter. I am sure he would receive a glorious ovation. In short, any good Liberal lecturer would undoubtedly be well received. D. T. ROSS.

SALT LAKE CITY, Dec. 10, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: In the copy of your paper which was sent to me as a sample I read a number of interesting articles, one from Utah on which I thought it might not be amiss to say a few words.

Your correspondent in concluding his letter, from one of the many Mormon settlements, complains of hard times, and uses the following words: "The inclosed dollar is to further my subscription. I wish I could send more, but at this time I cannot do it, for I get but a poor chance to earn money or anything else among these saintly, beastly thugs."

Now, the little town from which your correspondent writes is a quiet, well-ordered village, and the people are quite prosperous generally. The settlement is pleasantly located, and it has always kept pace with the many other successful little farming towns of Utah.

As far as I can learn, the writer of the letter to which I refer is a poor man, and it would seem that common sense would prompt more careful comments than he makes upon his neighbors, on whom he depends to some considerable extent for his livelihood.

Note where he says, "This infernal Mormon, filthy, debasing humbug" . . . "is a sore curse to this grand and delightful territory," . . . "degrading women to the level of beasts, filling the country with illegitimate, ignorant children, instilling into them a hatred, animosity, and disloyalty to the general government. How long, oh! how long will the officers of this mighty nation permit this nasty, vile system of disloyalty to lift up its vile hydra head and menace and defy the laws of the nation, and outrage society as they hav with their filthy, beastly debauchery these many years, and are still doing?"

I believe in free thought and free speech, but I also believe in cool temper and good judgment, and I submit to you that in my opinion this communication to which I refer lacks the most important elements. No matter how true the statements might be, any reasonable person might know that such abuse of an entire community would not be likely to help your correspondent's condition financially. If I am not mistaken, it is not long since the writer of that letter belonged to the church at which he hurls so many stinging adjectivs, and from my own knowledge I can assert that the church was no better then than now. Without doubt, at that time he was as much a "saintly, beastly thug" as any other of the members, and I hesitate not to say that he then would hav resented such charges with as much vehemence as any Mormon would now.

The chances are none of them will pay any attention to his letter, as they are so accustomed to this sort of abuse that it hardly creates a ripple in their placidity. I should hav paid no attention thereto, only that I hav a keen eye for illiberal Liberals. I think them the most contemptible beings on the face of the earth—that is, I would think so if I did not know better. The fact is, the possession of broad, untrammeled ideas intoxicates them, and they are at times as irresponsible as the veriest bigot. It is a question of time only, however, before they overcome this incubus, provided, of course, they be really liberal. I do not mention the name of your correspondent, because I do not wish to make this letter personal, and hav no desire to make him any more conspicuous than he has made himself.

You know, Mr. Editor, that a man cannot speak in similar terms of any community in the world without arousing feelings of resentment; and I ask you, even admitting that all his scathings were really deserved, if he in your opinion has reason to expect to earn money to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, or for any other purpose, in a little rural town where every one knows that he has said such things?

Freethought and Liberalism do not in my opinion giv authority to abuse anyone, neither do they make a philosopher of a foolish person suddenly. It takes time, and if the process of parturition is not a painful one, the neophyte may consider himself fortunate. There is altogether too much of a tendency to tyrannize over our fellows, just as we claim the priests hav done over us, when we smell the morning air and first feel that our limbs and brains are free. And this rebound from quiescent slavery to robust demonstrativness requires some brains to hold an equilibrium.

Let us try and furnish the necessary brains, and if possible avoid the errors of the past. So far as the improvement of the age and race is concerned, we might as well be slaves as tyrants; as well be wronged as wrong-doers.

I inclose one dollar. Please send your paper for a while, and let me get better acquainted with it. So far, I must say that I admire it for many reasons.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Odds and Ends.

A NEW YEAR'S STORY.

"If you please, sir, Mrs. Gillan says she can't come to wash windows to-day, because she's sick, and wants to know would you be kind enough to keep the work for her, and send her some medicin so she can get well?"

The little figure standing in the doorway of Mr. Howard's office with the above message was a study, and at once riveted the doctor's attention. She was clad in an uncouth affair for a dress, originally of some grayish material, but pieced, darned, and patched with various kinds of goods until it resembled "Joseph's coat of many colors." A red handkerchief, pinned under her dimpled chin, hightened the brilliancy of a pair of sparkling black eyes, and a mass of black, tangled curls were pushed back from a pale face that, under any circumstances, would be pronounced extremely interesting, if not absolutely beautiful. Her stockingless feet were encased in a pair of old rubbers, much too large, and which she confessed to having picked from a scavenger heap.

Dr. Howard gazed at the wan little object and wondered if life could be worth a great deal to such as she.

"What might be your name, little midget?" he inquired.

"It isn't 'little midget,' nor anything like it. They call me 'Odds and Ends,' mostly, because my clothes are made up of odds and ends, I s'pose! But my truly name is Margaret," replied the child.

"Odds and Ends! Well, I declare! But, upon my word, Miss Odds and Ends, you are a queer-looking genius. And where do you liv?—in a holly branch or on a juniper-tree?"

"Oh, I liv down there in Crazy Alley, rear of No. 9, second door, up four flights, through a long entry, turn to the left ——"

"There, there, that will do, Miss Odds and Ends. But tell me, little one," he said, kindly, "are you impervious to the cold, or do you prefer to go without stockings in December? Do you not know you are inviting croup, diphtheria, pneumonia, rheumatism, cramps, and what-not, by dressing in that fashion?"

"I don't know, sir; but this is all I hav. And I was never sick in all my life, only once, when I had the mumps, and once again, when I had the measles, or, I guess, the measles had me! Everyone thought I'd die, I was so very sick—but I didn't," she added, archly. "We did not liv in Crazy Alley then," she continued, "but we had parlors in a great hotel, where there were ever so many servants."

"Whom do you mean by 'we?'"

"Why, papa, mamma, and I; but papa died, and mamma says since then we do not liv at all; we only stay in the world."

"How old are you?" asked the doctor, thoroughly interested.

"Ten, sir."

By this time Odds and End, or little Margaret, was seated in the doctor's comfortable chair, and paying her respects to a handsome apple that the good man placed in her hands. At that juncture Mrs. Badger, the doctor's housekeeper, came bustling in.

"Well, if I sha' n't giv it up! Here is that singular child, sitting here as cosily as you please. Are you sick, you little black-eyed rag-tag?"

"Now, now, Mrs. Badger," interposed the doctor, "don't call too many names. The little one has brought me a message from Mrs. Gillan, who is not well to-day, and requires my services. Run on, now, Miss Margaret, and say I will be there directly."

"Yes, sir! Good-bye, and thanks for the apple," and away scampered the odd little figure.

The doctor looked after her a minute, and then turned to Mrs. Badger. "A queer child, that, Mrs. Badger—how long hav you known her?"

"Oh, for nearly a year, off and on. She comes here, occasionally, for cold pieces. Her mother is shy and distant and proud; has seen better circumstances, I believe, but became reduced, like many another one in cities like this, and is now, I fancy, very poor indeed. She is sickly, too, I believe."

The doctor sighed. "There's a deal of want and sorrow in the world, Mrs. Badger. When the child comes here again, it is my desire that you see she is properly clothed. It is simply preposterous to send a child out so thinly clad on such a raw, inclement day as this," and the doctor buttoned his great coat about his burly body, and prepared to make his daily round of calls; but, first of all, he drove to the squalid abode of Mrs. Gillan, for Dr. Howard was never known to neglect the humblest child of earth when such were sick and suffering. But all that day, and for many subsequent days, he was haunted by the large, wistful eyes of the strange child whose way in life seemed so hard and unnatural. Many times he inquired of Mrs. Badger if she had seen or learned anything more of quaint little Odds and Ends, but Mrs. Badger had not seen hide nor hair of her since the day she brought the message from Mrs. Gillan, and, upon inquiry, that hard-working woman had lost the run of her entirely. She said she thought they had moved into a cheaper tenement, or else gone to the poorhouse—or maybe they had found friends to care for them. It was hard telling what had become of them.

It was one whole year from that time, when one evening Dr. Howard was hastening along a crowded thoroughfare leading to a house of a patient. He was startled by a sudden cry of "Fire! fire!" and immediately the fire engins came plunging down the street. One glance showed the excessiv danger of a child midway upon the crossing and directly in the path of the foaming, galloping horses attached to the engin. In an instant they would be upon the child, who, frightened, swayed backwards and forwards. Quick as lightning, almost, Dr. Howard and the child were both down in the mud of the street, but out of the path of the clattering engin and the hoofs of the rushing, impatient horses. As he snatched the child, he fell, with her, prone in the street. Recovering himself immediately, he looked into the face of the burden that lay, quite unconscious, on his arm and beheld the countenance of—"Odds and Ends!"

A vehicle bore him and the newly-found wanderer quickly to his office, and when consciousness was fully restored, and she recognized her preserver, her delight knew no bounds, for she said: "You had such a kind face, I always liked you."

"Then why did you not come and see me?"

"Well, we moved to cheaper quarters, and mamma and I were both sick, and it was a good long way to your office from where we went to liv."

"Where were you going when the accident happened?" inquired the doctor.

Odds and Ends was silent.

"You need not tell me unless you wish, little one," said the doctor, tenderly.

"I may as well tell you," she said, after a pause. "I was going to a pawn-shop—mamma sent me with this ring—see; it is an opal. A dear friend gave it to my mamma before she saw my papa, and she has kept it all this time because she liked the one who gave it to her very much, and she did not want to part with the ring, but, you see, we got very poor, and mamma isn't well at all. This ring is the last we hav to part with, except mamma's wedding-ring." Saying which, the little girl took the circlet from its casket and slipped it upon the doctor's smallest finger.

What was there about the act that caused the man's face to change, first red and then to a pallid hue, and his firm hands to tremble like leaves in the winds of October? Did he attach any superstition to the brilliant and changeful colors of the opal, as he examined the ring? or was some old memory of the past, long latent, now asserting its existence?

"Margaret! Margaret!" he said, in a tremulous tone, "take this bank-note to your mother, and leave me the ring."

"Why, havn't you made a mistake, Doctor Howard? This bill has a 50 on it."

"No mistake, little one. The ring is more precious than many times that amount—indeed, it is priceless." And he turned his head away, that the child might not see the tears that were in his eyes.

"Fifty dollars! Oh, what will my poor mamma say! I must go now, for she will be anxious about me. Good-night."

"Wait—I am going with you."

"Oh, I am so glad!—and you will prescribe for mamma, won't you?"

"Yes, child, I will." And very soon they were being whirled rapidly in the doctor's own carriage to the humble dwelling Margaret called home.

"O mamma, I hav been almost killed—I hav; but this good doctor—the same one I used to tell you about—has saved me and brought me home—and see, mamma dear! the bank-note, and—"

"Hush!" said the doctor, imperativly. "Your mamma has fainted. Quick!—bring me a glass of water.

Languidly the dark eyes opened, and Margaret's mother whispered, "Roland."

"Yes, it is I, Julia," said the doctor, smiling.

Fifteen years before these two people had been friends and lovers, and the opal ring was the outward sign of their affection for each other; but a misunderstanding had parted them and made them as strangers. It was the recognition of the ring and the inscription upon the inside—"While life shall last. R. H."—together with the resemblance of the child to its mother, that awakened the memory of other days in the breast of the doctor.

It happened to be the last night of the old year when Margaret's mother and the doctor sat recounting the history of the past.

"Now I hav found you, I cannot lose you again," said the doctor. "I want these little Odds and Ends to dust my office table, and to let the sunlight in. Will you come and liv with me, Margaret?"

"If you will take mamma, too," answered the child, smiling.

Happy tears fell from eyes used only to tears of sorrow, as the doctor looked inquiringly at Margaret's mother. I do not know what the doctor whispered in her ear, but she smiled assent to something, and she and Margaret rode home with the doctor. Just as the carriage halted before the doctor's residence the city hall clock struck the hour of twelve.

"Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring happy bells across the snow.
The year is going; let him go.
Ring out the false, ring in the true."

This the doctor repeated softly.

Mrs. Badger was made acquainted with the facts, and, lifting her hands, she exclaimed, "Well, I never heard of such a thing in all my born days, never! However, I wish you all a very happy new year, and I guess it will be, for it has begun that way already. Odds and Ends, you are a little treasure!"

"So she is," said her mother, kissing her fondly.

The next morning, New Year's Day, there was a quiet wedding in the doctor's parlor, and the doctor had great pleasure in introducing his new wife to his callers that day. No one thought her sickly, for her face grew rosy and she began to improve from the moment she bade adieu to her old surroundings and took on the new life.

"What a strange mystery is life," she said that evening, "and how strangely some things are brought about."

"It is made up of 'Odds and Ends,'" laughed the doctor, drawing little Margaret to his side. "I am richer than I was yesterday, for now I hav two objects to love and care for."

"How long will you love us?" inquired Margaret, turning the opal ring upon his finger.

"While life shall last," was the grave reply.

Psyche Ceres.

A little girl whom I shall call Psyche Ceres, is the daughter of a reformer, who has endured much for his opinions. She is two and one-half years old, and says, "I was Psyche Ceres before I was born!"

Psyche Ceres!—and who shall tell
Thou wast not born an evangel?
A pure and perfect Psyche sweet,
Yet, without Ceres, incomplete?
Like some fair dream of wonder-land,
Made real by enchanter's wand,
Thou standest, in thy babyhood,
Repeating thoughts scarce understood.
We, older children, groping slow,
May neither guess, nor think, nor know,
By what strange process, sure and true,
Life makes its myst'ries known to you.
Psyche Ceres! may thy quick brain
Grow only best and choicest grain;
Which, as a lever, strong and swift,
The cause of nations may uplift.
Thus may all aspirations be
Securely sheltered deep in thee;
All sacrifice, and pain, and woe,
Changed in'o joy, in thee to glow.
Thy pulsing mind may bear the news,
Refreshing as the morning dews—
Psyche must rule his head and heart,
Who from Suffering's touch would part.

"What does Psyche Ceres mean? We children do not know." Of course you do not understand, and I am going to tell you all about it, for it is as interesting as a story.

Away back in the childhood of the race the nations had a way of deifying, that is, of making gods and goddesses, of objects, or processes of nature, that they did not fully comprehend, and worshiping the same. They had poetic traditions attaching to all their deities, whose favor they sought to gain by sacrifices of that which they supposed to be most pleasing to them. This is called mythology, and although we know it to be a system of fables, yet it embraces much of the history of ancient peoples, and in it may be traced the origin of religious worship, as well as many beautiful precepts of moral philosophy, the wonderful workings of nature, and the great forces that operate in the planetary movements. Mythology is a very interesting study, and when you are older you will pass many pleasant hours reading about the strange myths of the ancients.

Psyche (pronounced Si-kee) is a Greek word, and means the breath, or soul, or perhaps, we might say, it means that which thinks. In the old mythology it was said to hav been given as a name to the youngest daughter of a king. She, Psyche, was a very beautiful girl, and as pure and good as she was beautiful. We may suppose her beauty was of that pure, elevated, noble type that draws all hearts to its possessor, and whose influence makes men and women and children better and truer. Anyway, Psyche inspired so much veneration that the people built altars and consecrated them to her, thus making of her a goddess. Venus, another goddess, very beautiful, too, and in whose footsteps flowers were said to spring up as she walked, but who inspired people with a different sort of love, was jealous and angry because Psyche attracted so much attention. She had a son called Cupid, and she bade him to make Psyche love some horrible creature, some miserable, old, deformed hobgoblin. Like a good boy, he went to obey his mamma, but as soon as he saw the lovely Psyche, what did he do but fall in love with her himself. He carried her right away to a delightful palace, surrounded by groves, fruit-trees, flowers, and fountains, and every night he would go and pay her a visit, but, as he went away before daylight, Psyche could not see the face of her lover. Her two sisters told her that the reason he did not let her see him was because he was old and hideous, and that the best thing she could do was to kill him in his sleep. So one night she went softly to his bedside as he slept, to see what sort of a creature he really was, and what was her astonishment to see the handsomest being she had ever seen in all her life. Stooping over to get a good look at him, a drop of hot oil fell on his naked shoulder and woke him. He felt dreadfully at what she had done, and jumped up and ran for dear life.

Psyche felt so bady then, she thought she would kill herself; but although she swallowed many kinds of poisons, nothing would hurt or injure her at all. Then she wandered in search of her beloved Cupid, and finally came to his mother's house. But Venus was still angry with her, and said she should be her slave, and poor Psyche had a hard time of it until, at last, Cupid found her out, and rescued her. She was lovelier than ever, for she had suffered a great deal, and suffering purifies and beautifies even the plainest face. Cupid would not part from her again, and they were soon after united in marriage by Jupiter himself.

Ceres (pronounced Sereez) was called the goddess who presided over grain and harvests. Her home was with other gods, on a mountain called Olympus, and she had one daughter, whose name was Proserpine. Pluto, who was king over the lower regions, stole this girl away from her mother, at which she was so hurt and angry that she fled from the home of the gods and came down to the earth to liv. She grieved for her daughter, and in her grief neglected her person, and, disguising herself, went about as an old woman. While she was wandering from place to place she fell in with King Celeus, whose wife, wanting a nurse, engaged her in that capacity, for her baby boy, Demophon. Ceres became attached to the child, and she conceived the idea of making him immortal like the gods; so she breathed upon him, and fed as well as anointed him with ambrosia, a fragrant plant upon which the gods were supposed to feed, and every night before retiring she would toss him up and down in the blazing fire. Well, he grew so healthy and handsome that everybody marveled, and Metamra, the baby's mother, thought she would watch and see what the nurse did to make her little boy grow so pretty and keep so well. You can imagin her horror when she saw the nurse toss him right into the fire, and then lift him out again. Of course the baby's mother screamed, and this just spoilt the whole thing, for the nurse let him drop in the fire in her fright, and he was burnt to a crisp. They would hav murdered Ceres then, but she instantly appeared in her true character, and they could not harm her. She commanded them to build her an altar and a temple, which they did, and, full of sorrow, she went in it to liv. She had previously caused a famin on the earth, and everybody was sore distressed for food. Jupiter sent for her to return to her old home, and begged her to restore the fruits and grains to the children of the earth, but she would not listen to the petitions of the gods unless they would restore her daughter to her heart and arms. Finding that she would relent only on this condition, Jupiter sent Mercury to beg Pluto to let Proserpine go and visit her mother. He was king of Hades, and he said, "Yes, she can go if she wishes." But before she went he carelessly handed her a little pomegranate seed, which she, not thinking of, or knowing the consequences, ate. Of course Proserpine was tickled almost to pieces to see her dear mother again, and Ceres was overjoyed to hav her daughter once more, and they kissed each other a great many times. In a few minutes Ceres said, "My darling, you didn't eat anything down there in Hades, did you?" "No, mamma dear, nothing but one little pomegranate seed."

"Oh! that is too bad, my child, for now you will hav to go back and stay with your husband one-third of every year, but the other two-thirds you can spend with me on the earth."

Ceres was no longer angry, after seeing her daughter, and she caused the fruits of the earth to come forth in great abundance, and went back to Olympus to liv with the other immortals in her old home. She was very kind to Triptolemus, the brother of the babe she caused to perish in the flames, and instructed the king in the mysteries of her worship. She is represented in statuary as possessing a mild and benevolent face, her head garlanded with corn, and in her hand a bunch of wheat, corn, and poppy-heads, and sometimes she is represented carrying a torch or a mystic basket.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter. The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library. Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

HEALTH HINTS TO WOMEN

IMPORTANT INFORMATION FOR ALL.

THE DANISH CURE EXPLAINED

BY WILHELMINE D. SCHOTT,

Practitioner of the Danish Cure.

WITH PORTRAIT OF AUTHOR.

Heavy, toned paper, good margins; large type, widely spaced; extra cloth, black and gold side and back stamps; 12mo., 319 pp.; $1.50.

A VERY APPROPRIATE GIFT BOOK.

It tells you what physicians should tell their patients, but do not: How to avoid contracting "doctors' bills;" how to hav good health without taking medicins. Hints on every subject pertaining to the health of women and children.

PURPOSE OF THE WORK.

The author's design is to giv a general outline of the laws and conditions of health, with directions for the prevention of sickness and care of the sick. She considers Animal Electricity, used as directed in this book, a very important curativ agent.

Although written primarily for women, this book will be found almost equally useful to all. Most persons cannot be too frequently reminded of the truth of the old proverb, "An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure." The first step in the cure of disease is to remove the cause; then, in nearly all cases, Nature will remove the difficulty without other aid.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

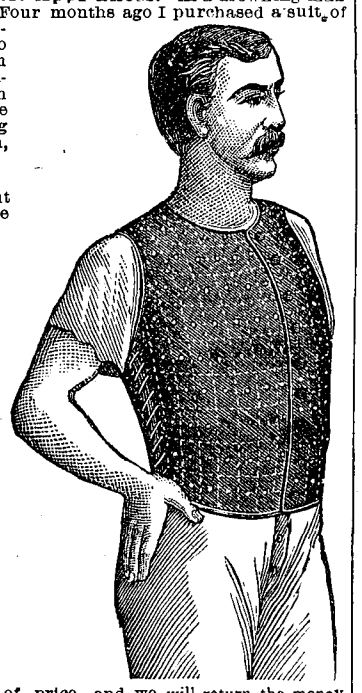
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothing for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

The Labarum of Constantine.

"By this sign thou shalt conquer!"

This volume contains Gibbon's Theological writings, separate from his Historical and Miscellaneous works. It shows when, where, and how Christianity originated; who were its founders; and what was the character, sentiments, manners, numbers, and condition of the primitive Christians.

Gibbon's Vindication of the 15th and 16th chapters of his History from the attacks of his Christian opponents, is reprinted verbatim from the original edition of his Miscellaneous Works, edited by Lord Sheffield, in 1796. It effectually and forever silenced his detractors; who, being vanquished in argument, unhesitatingly accused Gibbon of infidelity!

All that can be said by Christians in regard to the Origin of Christianity is reprinted from the valuable notes of DEAN MILMAN, WENCK, GUIZOT, an ENGLISH CHURCHMAN, (the learned editor of BOHN'S edition of Gibbon), and other eminent Christian historians.

Among the Illustrations will be found representations of the principal divinities of the Pagan mythology.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES,

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency,

As the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions, (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an EXTERNAL APPLICATION in from 30 to 60 days. No medicine taken. It has never been known to fail!

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuations of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. It is the second stage of Seminal Weakness, and causes wasting of the system and a dejected and haggard appearance, as you see here in cut. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the genito-urinary organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

"PRIVATE COUNSELOR"

Sent to any address, securely sealed, for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Gems of Thought.

BY general consent it is thought that no system of morality is equal to that which comes from believing the Christian system of religion; and to doubt its claim is held to be the worst of immorality, the worst of sins. There is no greater absurdity than this. Belief is not a matter of choice, not a matter of will, but with people of good intelligence it is a matter dependent upon evidence. It is not a person of sound mind who believes without evidence.—D. M. Bennett.

OVER and over again,
No matter which way I turn,
I always find in the book of life
Some lesson I hav to learn.
I must take my turn at the mill;
I must grind out the golden grain;
I must work at my task with a resolute will,
Over and over again.

Over and over again,
The brook in the meadow flows,
And over and over again
The ponderous mill wheel goes.
Once doing will not suffice,
Though doing be not in vain;
And a blessing failing us once or twice
May come if we try again.

SHOULD a traveler returning from "a far country" bring us an account of men wholly different from any with whom we were ever acquainted, men who were entirely divested of avarice, ambition, and revenge; who knew no pleasure but friendship, generosity, and public spirit; we should immediately, from these circumstances, detect the falsehood, and prove him a liar, with the same certainly as if he had stuffed his narration with stories of centaurs and dragons, miracles and prodigies. And if we would explode any forgery in history, we cannot make use of a more convincing argument than to prove that the actions ascribed to any person are directly contrary to the course of nature, and that no human motivs, in such circumstances, could ever induce him to such conduct. The veracity of Q. Curtius is as much to be suspected, when he describes the supernatural courage of Alexander, by which he was hurried on singly to attack multitudes, as when he describes his supernatural force and activity, by which he was able to resist them; so readily and universally do we acknowledge a uniformity in human motivs and actions, as well as in the operations of body.—Hume's Human Liberty and Necessity.

THE mere cessation of existence is no evil to anyone; the idea is only formidable through the illusion of the imagination which makes one conceive oneself as if one were alive and feeling oneself dead. —J. S. Mill.

THE making himself drunk, in a person whom drunkenness excites to do harm to others, is a crime against others, so idleness, except in a person receiving support from the public, or except when it constitutes a breach of contract, cannot without tyranny be made a subject of legal punishment; but if, either from idleness, or any other avoidable cause, a man fails to perform his legal duties to others, as, for instance, to support his children, it is no tyranny to force him to fulfil that obligation, by compelling labor, if no other means are available.—Mills's Liberty.

AUGUSTUS CÆSAR would say that he wondered that Alexander the Great feared he should want work, having no men to conquer; as if it were not as hard a matter to keep as to conquer.—Bacon.

THERE is no man but for his own interest hath an obligation to be honest. There may be sometimes temptations to be otherwise; but, all cards cut up, he shall find it the greatest ease, the highest profit, the best pleasure, the most safety, and the noblest fame, to hold the horns of this altar, which, in all assays, can in himself protect him. And though, in the march of human life over the stage of this world, a man shall find presented some living examples of thriving vice, and several opportunities invite him upon a seeming advantage to close with underhand practices; yet every man ought so to improve his progress in what is just and right as to be able to discern the fraud and feigned pleasurableness of the bad, and to choose and follow what is good and warrantable. If anyone should object that the world is for man bad throughout, so that the good man should be seen to be overpowered by the evil; the case is long since resolved by Antisthenes (d. 371 B.C.) that it is better with a few good men to fight against an army of God, than, with swarms and shoals of bad men, to hav a few good men his enemies.—Owen Feltham (1603—1680).

LET Truth and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter? —Milton's Areopagatica.

THERE is no one book extant in any language or in any country which can in any degree be compared to the Bible for antiquity, for authority, for importance, the dignity, the variety, and the curiosity of the matter it contains.—Bishop Porteous. [Note.—Dr. Porteous was Bishop of London about the end of last century, dying, I believe, in 1809; and it is curious and gratifying to think that no men in England occupying a similar position would now suffer himself to make any such statement. Every lowly man knows that there are older books than any that Moses wrote, if he wrote any at all. The "authority" of the Bible is completely riddled. There is no important information in it that may not be got elsewhere. We feel no disposition to deny that in the book of Job and in the Psalms there are detached passages of great dignity, but, on the other hand, there are many passages so loathsome and disgusting that no decent man would read them to his own wife and children. There are good things in the Bible; but none too good for the human mind to conceive and none so bad that they cannot be accounted for but on the supposition of a devil's inspiring them.—Hylax.]

FEAR to do base, unworthy things is valor;
If they be done to us, to suffer them,
Is valor too.—Ben Jonson.

Odds and Ends.

A NEW JERSEY man has been put in jail for having fourteen wives. Must be a great relief to him.

A NEGRO baby was born in Georgia, recently, which weighed only one pound and a quarter, and a "literary feller," hearing of the circumstance, remarked that it was funny how anything so dark could be so light.

"YOU hav been up before me half a dozen times this year," said an Austin justice, severely, to a local vagrant, who thus made answer: "Come, now, judge, none of that. Every time I've been here I've seen you here. You are here more than I am. People who liv in glass houses shouldn't throw stones."

"WHY, old boy, what is the matter with you? You look as though you had lost your best friend." "Do I?" was the reply. "Well, I havn't. On the contrary, I hav just gained a friend." "You don't look it." "I know I don't. You see, last night I asked little Miss B—— to marry me, and she said she would always be to me a very dear friend."

A CHAP from the northern part of the state went to bed at one of the hotels the other night, and blew out the gas instead of turning it off. The gas rushed out, the room was close, and in about half an hour the smell became so strong that the stranger got out of bed, opened the door, and shouted for the clerk. The clerk came up and demanded to know what was up. "I never stopped here over night before," replied the stranger, "and I don't know but this smell is all right, but it 'pears to me as if something had busted somewhere."

"WELL, old fellow, I hear that your grandmother is dead." "Yes," replied the old fellow somewhat sadly, "she died yesterday." "It is the way of the world. We must all die some time, and the old lady was well advanced in years. She left a last will and testament, of course? I hav understood that she was very wealthy." "Oh, yes, she left a will and testament," still more sadly. "You were always a favorit of hers. Your name was mentioned, of course?" "Yes," he replied, and here the tears began to roll down his cheek, "my name was mentioned. I am to hav the Testament."

"JUMP on the scale," the butcher said,
Unto a miss one day—
"I'm used to weighing, and," said he,
"I'll tell you what you weigh."

"Ah, yes," came quick the sweet reply
From lips seemed made to kiss;
"I'm sure, sir, that it would not be
First time you've weighed amiss."

The butcher blushed: he hung his head,
And knew not what to say;
He merely wished to weigh the girl;
Himself was given away.

DECEMBER BREEZES.

And the hose—what of the hose?
Of the ladies when it blows?
We can see them plain or striped,
On each buxom female biped,
When it blows.

As she trips across the gutter,
With her wrappings in a flutter,
She is in a dreadful putter
When it blows;
And she glows
Like a rose,
For she knows
That the men folks at the corner
Hav their naughty eyes upon her
And her hose—
Hose, hose, hose, hose, hose—
Gosh almighty, how it blows!

WOMANHOOD AND ITS SPHERE.

It was a Vassar graduate, of form and feature fair,
That came unto an editor who sat within his lair.
Her face of pure Madonna type, a silver sheen her hair.
"I know, sir," said the lovely maid, "that journalists who seek
To reach the pinnacle of fame and sit astride its peak
Must strike out from the trodden path, and virgin conquests seek.

"What broader field can ever be before your vision laid
Than that in which are seen alike the matron and the maid—
The holy sphere of womanhood—true womanhood?" she said.

The editor his eagle eye cast stealthily around.
No voice was near, nor heard he then of welcome feet the sound:
Nor did he know, so scared was he, eight ounces to the pound.

"The thralldom," said the graduate, "in which our sex is held
By Fashion's rigid laws, no doubt, you often hav beheld.
Now I will break those galling chains and health to beauty weld.

"And ere again upon the earth doth softly beam the moon,
Your facil pen shall tell the world of woman's greatest boon—
My patent non-reversible, self-acting chemiloon."

Up sprang the pallid editor. "Hence, horrid fiend!" he cried.
"I had a friend, a winsome lad, whe took himself a bride—
A maid of culture, birth, and blood, and property beside.

"But hardly had the honeymoon its blissful zenith reached,
When she began to argue, and forevermore she preached
That hygienic night shirts were of cotton made, unbleached.

"He bought the fatal garment, and (the bare thought makes me sick)
At once imagined that he was a well disguised bedtick.
His reason fled, and now he is a chemiloonatic."

They hav lived under one intellectual roof, felt the glow of the same fireside, and broken together the bread of life. Such a paper is to thousands a substitute for the church.—GEORGE CHAINEY, in This World.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, founded by D. M. Bennett, is to-day perhaps the strongest foe with which superstition has to contend, and a long future of great usefulness is, we trust and believe, before it.—Winted, Conn., Press.

There ought to be five hundred subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER in this county, just to rebuke the infamous church bigots who are using force and fraud to suppress Liberalism.—Worthington, Minn., Advance.

This sterling and widely-circulated Freethought journal has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers. THE TRUTH SEEKER is a great paper, and deserves the most generous support of the Liberal public. The recent numbers received are splendid in every respect.—San Francisco Universe.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has gathered its resources, and will be a stronger, better, and brighter paper than ever.—Liberal League Man.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause.—Kansas Blade.

A Good Chance to Make Money.

I want to sell a Silver Mine in Colorado. I wish intending purchasers to make all the inquiries possible as to my honesty in dealing, and to make all the inquiry and to put the mine to all the test they desire before they pay the purchase money or any part of it.

James Vincent's Paper,

The American Nonconformist.

Established in 1879. Price, $1.50 per year.

Editor, JAMES VINCENT, SR. Publishers, H. and L. VINCENT, Tabor, Iowa.

Its motto is: "Total and Immediate Emancipation from Slavery to Bondholders, Railroad Corporations, National Banks, and Ecclesiastical Dictation."

It is the organ of no sect or party.

No paper in the United States, or in the world, is bolder or more emphatic in its demands for reforms in the interest of the commonwealth.

It demands a total separation of church and state.

It insists that the abolition of what is called the Christian church is absolutely necessary before permanent and vital reforms can be accomplished.

It demands that the producer of wealth shall be protected by law in the enjoyment of the largest share of the products of his labor.

"What a Piece of Work is Man!"

WHAT A VALUABLE JOURNAL IS "MAN,"

THE EXPONENT OF THE PRINCIPLES OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

It is Published Weekly at one dollar per Annum.

T. B. WAKEMAN and T. C. LELAND, Editors. Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, James Parton, Courtlandt Palmer, S. P. Putnam, Osborne Ward, H. B. Brown, Dr. T. S. Lambert, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and other well-known writers, contributors.

MAN is every inch a man, and dares to say and do whatever becomes a man.

MAN is a man among men, hail fellow, honest, above board, and encourages other men to the same high standard.

MAN is a live man; works to raise up more live men, promotes the interests of live men, and has no mission nor message for the dead.

MAN is a friend of the poor man—"A man's a man for a' that" and takes the side of the Man of mills against the man of millions.

MAN is an honest man; carries in his pocket of principles the "Philosopher's Stone"—PAY AS YOU GO! and demands that churches, ministers, and millionaires shall pay their taxes as honest men do.

MAN is a free man, and demands equal rights in the public schools and equal privileges on the first, seventh, or any day of the week.

MAN is a temperate man, but proposes to be so on his own motion, not on compulsion—because he knows enough to be so himself, not because the church is inspired from on high to force him.

MAN is a man of the world—this world—and one world at a time. The whole planet is his interest, his constituency, and his care.

MAN is a fearless, determined man.

"Whether on the gallows high, or in the battle's van,
The fittest place for man to die is where he dies for man.

But this MAN—our MAN—though "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief," was not born to die. He died recently, and couldn't. He was slightly slain "in the battle's van," but he came to life again; and now, dear reader, he asks you for a dollar for your instruction and his support.

MAN is the special organ of organization. He teaches organization, preaches organization, and works for organization as the chief ark of safety for laborers and Liberals, and the strongest force with which to meet the old organizations for the promotion of theology, tyranny, and the dissemination of useless knowledge.

MAN includes woman; is the best friend of woman, and works for her development, her just position.

In short, among the "New Political Forces" MAN is one of the Forces, and is armed for the organization of a new party and the coming struggle with the old parties.

Every reader with the least reform and progress in him should send at once for MAN. Every reader with none at all, should send and get some in him, and start right on the road to progress.
